

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. HANSARD'S PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES,

APPOINTED TO MEET 5 MARCH, 1874, AND THENCE CONTINUED

HER MAJESTY QUEEN VICTORIA.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, 5th February, 1875.

THE PARLIAMENT, which had been Prorogued successively from the 7th day of August, 1874, to the 23rd day of October; thence to the 16th day of December; thence to the 5th day of February, 1875, met this day for Despatch of Business.

The Session of PARLIAMENT was opened by Commission.

The HOUSE OF PEERS being met,

THE LORD CHANCELLOR acquainted the House,

“That it not being convenient for Her Majesty to be personally present here this day, She has been pleased to cause a Commission under the Great Seal to be prepared, in order to the holding of this Parliament.”

VOL. CCXXII. [THIRD SERIES.]

Then Five of the Lords Commissioners — namely, The LORD CHANCELLOR, The LORD PRIVY SEAL (The Earl of Malmesbury), The LORD CHAMBERLAIN OF THE HOUSEHOLD (The Marquess of Hertford), The LORD STEWARD OF THE HOUSEHOLD (The Earl Beauchamp), and The LORD SKELMERSDALE (Captain of the Yeoman of the Guard), being in their Robes, and seated on a Form placed between the Throne and the Woolsack, commanded the Yeoman Usher of the Black Rod to let the Commons know “The Lords Commissioners desire their immediate attendance in this House, to hear the Commission read.”

Who being come, with their Speaker; —The Commission was read by the Clerk:—Then

THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR delivered HER MAJESTY'S SPEECH to both Houses of Parliament, as follows:—

" My Lords, and Gentlemen,

" It is with great satisfaction that I again meet you and resort to the advice and assistance of my Parliament.

" I continue to receive assurances of friendship from all Foreign Powers. The peace of Europe has remained, and I trust will remain, unbroken. To preserve and consolidate it will ever be a main object of my endeavours.

" The Conference held at Brussels on the Laws and Usages of War has concluded its sittings. My Government have carefully examined the reports of its proceedings; but, bearing in mind, on the one hand, the importance of the principles involved, and, on the other, the widely divergent opinions which were there expressed, and the improbability of their being reconciled, I have not thought it right to accede to proposals which have been made for further negotiations on the subject. The correspondence which has passed will be presented to you.

" The Government of Spain, presided over by Marshal Serrano, has ceased to exist, and the Prince of Asturias has been called to the throne under the title of King Alfonso XII. The question of formally recognizing, in concert with other Powers, the newly restored Monarchy, is at this moment before my Government, and its decision will not be long delayed. It is my earnest hope that internal peace may be speedily restored to a great, but unfortunate, country.

" The exertions of my naval and consular servants in the repression of the East African Slave Trade have not been relaxed, and I confidently trust that they will bring about the complete extinction of a traffic equally repugnant to humanity and injurious to legitimate commerce.

" The differences which had arisen between China and Japan, and which at one time threatened to lead to war between those States, have been happily adjusted. I have learnt with pleasure that the good offices of my Minister at Peking have been largely instrumental in bringing about this result.

" The past year has been one of general prosperity and progress throughout my Colonial Empire.

" On the Gold Coast, a steady advance has been made in the establishment of civil government, peace has been maintained, and I have procured the assent of the protected tribes to the abolition of slavery. Henceforward, I trust, freedom will exist there as in every part of my dominions.

" In Natal, I have found myself under the necessity of reviewing the sentence which had been passed upon a native Chief, and of considering the condition of the tribes, and their relations to the European settlers and my Government. I doubt not that I shall have your concurrence in any measures which it may become my duty to adopt for ensuring a wise and humane system of native administration in that part of South Africa.

" Papers will be laid before you on these several matters.

" The King and Chiefs of Fiji having made a new offer of their Islands unfettered by conditions, I have thought it right to accept the cession of a territory which, independently of its large natural resources, offers important maritime advantages to my fleets in the Pacific.

"An ample harvest has restored prosperity to the Provinces of my Eastern Empire which, last year, were visited with famine. By the blessing of Providence my Indian Government has been able entirely to avert the loss of life which I had reason to apprehend from that great calamity.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"I have directed the Estimates of the year to be prepared and presented to you without delay.

"My Lords, and Gentlemen,

"The condition of the finances is satisfactory. The trade of the country in the past year has somewhat fallen short of that of the year before, but the general prosperity of the people, supported as it has been by an excellent harvest, as well as by the great reductions lately made in taxation, has led to a steady increase in the consumption of all the necessaries of life, and of those articles which contribute to the revenue.

"The various statutes of an exceptional or temporary nature now in force for the preservation of peace in Ireland will be brought to your notice with a view to determine whether some of them may not be dispensed with.

"Several measures which were unavoidably postponed at the end of last Session will be again introduced. Among the most important are those for simplifying the Transfer of Land and completing the reconstruction of the Judicature.

"Bills will be also laid before you for facilitating the Improvement of the Dwellings of the Working Classes in large towns; for the consolidation and amendment of the Sanitary Laws; and for the prevention of the pollution of rivers.

"A measure has been prepared for consolidating and amending the laws relating to Friendly Societies. Its object will be to assist without unnecessarily interfering with the laudable efforts of my people to make provision for themselves against some of the calamities of life.

"A Bill for the amendment of the Merchant Shipping Acts will be laid before you.

"Your attention will be moreover directed to legislation for the better security of my subjects from personal violence, and for more effectually providing for the trial of offences by establishing the office of a Public Prosecutor.

"Although the Report of the Commission issued by me to inquire into the state and working of the law as to offences connected with trade has not yet been made to me, I trust that any legislation on this subject which may be found to be expedient may take place in the present Session.

"You will also be invited to consider a measure for improving the law as to Agricultural Tenancies.

"I commend to your careful consideration these and other measures which may be submitted to you, and I pray that your deliberations may, under the Divine blessing, result in the happiness and contentment of my people."

Then the Commons withdrew.

House adjourned during pleasure,

House resumed.

The QUEEN'S SPEECH reported by The LORD CHANCELLOR.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE: My Lords, it is with extreme diffidence that I present myself before your Lordships to move that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty in reply to Her Majesty's Gracious Speech from the Throne. Though deeply sensible of my little fitness to perform so important and so responsible a duty, nevertheless I am encouraged by the recollection that the Members of your Lordships' House have ever been wont in past years to accord an indulgent ear to those who, for the first time, ventured to address them. The full measure of that indulgence I now beg your Lordships to extend to myself, and ask you to look with leniency on my inadequate efforts, and to pardon any inaccuracy of expression that may fall from my lips as spoken in ignorance of the customs of your Lordships' House.

Before proceeding to the discussion of the topics mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, I would endeavour to express the deep regret that must be felt by every one of your Lordships for the cause which has prevented Her Majesty the Queen from carrying out Her gracious intention of opening Parliament in person. That cause has been a source of sorrow to every loyal heart, and we must most devoutly hope, as the latest accounts justify us in doing, that in a short time all reason for Her Majesty's maternal anxiety may have passed away.

It will be a source of satisfaction to your Lordships to understand that Her Majesty's relations with Foreign Powers continue on the same friendly footing as heretofore. Such an assurance is the best guarantee for the safety and interest of our commercial community abroad, and gives the surest promise of prosperity at home; and while our own friendly ties remain unbroken, it is satisfactory to know that the same condition prevails with regard to the other Great Powers. Although it is impossible, perhaps, to persuade ourselves that the great armaments on the Continent are established merely for purposes of defence, still there is at present no cloud on the political horizon, no indication of a coming storm.

Your Lordships are aware that an invitation was issued last year to the Great Powers to assemble in Conference for the discussion of the treatment of prisoners of war. As long as this proposal emanated from a private society, it was not considered a matter in which Her Majesty's Government should interfere: but when the question was taken up by one of the Great Powers, and the area of discussion was enlarged so as to comprehend the laws and usages of modern warfare, it was decided that this country should not be unrepresented. Her Majesty's Government, however, felt it to be their duty—and with great wisdom—to make it a condition of the attendance of our Representative, that no matters relating to International Law or maritime warfare should be introduced for discussion, and our Representative was instructed carefully to abstain from participating in any such debates that might fortuitously arise. It was urged by the promoters of the Conference that the present laws of warfare were not clearly enough defined; and it was their object that the Great Powers should deliberate upon some fixed and certain military code, which should be an infallible guide to generals in command of armies in the field. Her Majesty's Government have carefully watched the progress of this Conference, and upon subsequent deliberation have arrived at the conclusion that the interest of invaders and invaded are so irreconcilable, and the contingencies that may arise in time of war so various and uncontrollable, that it would be impossible to lay down any fixed rules which would meet with general acquiescence. Holding this opinion, your Lordships will agree that Her Majesty's Government are fully justified in the determination at which they have arrived—to take no further part in any Conference on this subject.

I am sure your Lordships will consider it a matter of congratulation, that the exertions made by Her Majesty's Government for the repression of the Slave Trade on the East Coast of Africa have not been without their fruit. Owing in a great measure to the loyal manner in which the Sultan of Zanzibar has adhered to the terms of the Treaty lately entered into on the subject, the traffic in slaves by sea has greatly diminished, and there is every expectation of a further diminution. And I would further suggest, my Lords, that it is of the greatest importance to our largely increasing trade in the China Seas that the threatened hostilities between that country and Japan have been so fortunately avoided. Had it not been so, there would have been grave apprehension for the safety of our merchant vessels in those waters; and the greatest praise is due to Her Majesty's Representatives at Peking and Yeddo, to whose exertions this peaceful arrangement may mainly be attributed. Before leaving the subject of Foreign Affairs, there is one more point to which I would desire leave to draw the attention of your Lordships. We have seen, during many months, a great and chivalrous nation, a nation that was our active ally in a time of general European convulsion—with whose name the honour of the British arms will ever be associated, and whose country was the theatre of their exploits—harassed by civil war, torn by factions, and so divided against herself, that all hope for her tranquillity seemed to have passed away.

The English people, cherishing still the sympathies of the earlier years of the century, have waited, though despairingly, and hoped, though against hope, for a brighter day to dawn on the race, whose soldiers had fought by the side of their own. But now, by the suddenly expressed voice of the Spanish Army, the Representative of an ancient House has been called to the Throne; and although a Government founded upon military pronunciamento may not be in accordance with the ideas of the lovers of Constitutional Monarchy, yet, for the sake of peace, and the material prosperity of Spain, we may with sincerity pray that wise and impartial counsellors may guide the youthful impulses of the new Sovereign to the accomplishment of a successful issue. The actions and expressions of the King since his arrival in the country afford us every reason to expect such an issue; and I am sure your Lordships will read here with pleasure, that his recognition by the Government of this country is now under consideration.

My Lords, it would be presumptuous in me at this early period to speculate upon the future policy of the Spanish Government. Yet I would submit that we must hail with satisfaction those announcements which have appeared in the daily press, which inform us that liberty of conscience and freedom of religious worship are to be respected. When we consider the evils which have fallen upon Spain, not only in our time, but in days of yore, it would indeed be deplorable if the difficulties of the new Government should be increased by the adoption of re-actionary measures, which would deprive them of the sympathy of all free people, whether in Europe or in America. And I would further suggest, my Lords, that the events which have taken place in Spain from the year 1868 to the present time, have tended greatly to demonstrate the wisdom of that foreign policy which successive Governments of this country have in modern times, and in all cases, endeavoured to practice. Although it has been the care of Her Majesty's Advisers to secure by their influence and co-operation the maintenance of the general peace of Europe, and the faithful performance of international obligations, still they have studiously avoided any direct interference in the internal affairs of foreign nations. By thus dealing, a wise and prudent principle has been established, which is compatible with a due regard for the honour of this country, and a determination to vindicate that honour should it ever be assailed.

My Lords, in Her Majesty's gracious Speech from the Throne last year your Lordships were informed of the impending famine in Bengal, and the paragraph further stated, that the Viceroy and Governor General had been directed to spare no cost to mitigate this terrible calamity. The noble Marquess who moved the Address in reply, stated it to be our duty to alleviate the sufferings occasioned by that calamity, and I hope your Lordships will permit me to bear my humble testimony to the admirable manner in which that duty has been performed. I need not bring back to your Lordships' recollection the paragraphs in The Times newspaper, which notified the subscriptions to the Bengal Famine Fund. These were no less a monument of British charity to the distressed, than an evidence of the goodwill of the English people towards their fellow-subjects in the far East. The distress was greatest in those parts which were most inaccessible to traffic; there was often great difficulty in procuring carriage; and that native apathy, to which the noble Marquess so ably alluded last year, rendered the duties of the distributing officers doubly harassing. My Lords, the fearful misery and destruction of human life that would have occurred among those teeming millions if prompt measures of relief had not been undertaken, would have been almost beyond calculation. To quote the words of a telegram of the 21st of March last, if it had not been for the measures taken by the Government, "there would have been thousands of starvation deaths ere this." The Famine of 1874 would have swept across those thickly-populated plains, and traced its disastrous course by ravages equal to, if not surpassing, those of previous dreadful visitations. But now, my Lords, in my opinion, an epoch has been marked in the history of British India, to which, whatever may be the future of that great Empire, future generations of Englishmen may look back with pride and satisfaction. And I would further add, with regard to the people of India themselves, that the recollection of our open-handed liberality, of our fatherly care for them in this the time of their great distress, will go far to strengthen their confidence in, and reconcile them to, the governing race. And to whom, my Lords, shall we give the praise, but to those who, in conjunction with Her Majesty's Government, so ably initiated, and so practically carried out, those measures of relief. In mentioning the past and present Lieutenant Governors of Bengal, I am but naming two well-trying public servants, who have added new lustre to their well-deserved reputation by their conduct at this crisis. And I am glad to have this opportunity of paying my humble tribute to the Viceroy of India, to whom I am indebted for many acts of personal kindness. The noble Marquess who presides at the India Office alluded last year, in far abler terms than I can hope to command, to the vigour and judgment of the Governor General in the face of this great responsibility. It was my fortune to be in India for many months after the Governor General's first arrival in the country, and I had full opportunity of witnessing the growth of that confidence in his great and varied talents among all classes of the community, which is the reflex of that which he enjoys at the hands of the noble Marquess and of all those who have been associated with him in political life at home.

And now, my Lords, to turn to the Colonies. Before proceeding to the few remarks I have to offer your Lordships, I would ask leave to express from the bottom of my heart my deep sorrow for the great bereavement which has befallen my noble Friend the Secretary of State for the Colonies—a feeling which I am confident will be shared by every one in your Lordships' House. Your Lordships will pardon me if I say no more—in this House I know it is unnecessary. Of our Australian Colonies proper I will say but a few words, and those merely to bear witness from personal experience of the accuracy of the general reports regarding their progress and the increasing prosperity they are achieving. When we consider that little more than 40 years ago no British settler had permanently established himself on Victorian soil (for though Port Philip was discovered in 1802, no practical attempt at colonization was made until 1834), and then turn to contemplate that great city of Melbourne, founded on a swamp in 1836, now risen to the position of the eighth city of the British Empire—with its magnificent public buildings, its busy factories, its broad thoroughfares, and its large spaces of gardens, which conduce alike to public recreation and public health—we cannot but be impressed with the energy and determination which has so rapidly developed the resources of the country. And I would also testify to the vitality, equally in Victoria as in the other colonies I have visited, of that loyalty to the Crown which is in all climes the characteristic of our countrymen. And there is another colony added to our Australasian dependencies, the acquisition of which has to-day been announced to your Lordships in the Speech from the Throne. It is almost needless for me to point out to your Lordships the importance of the Fiji Islands, from their position in the centre of the South Pacific Ocean. Situated as they are, on the high road between the Australian Continent and America, we can hardly too highly rate their value as a depôt for our mail service, and a maritime station for the protection of our commercial interests. And, above all, we may congratulate Her Majesty's Government on having secured a vantage ground, from which, by the establishment of a strong Crown Colony in the centre of Polynesia, a watchful eye may be kept to check the abuses in the labour traffic of the Islands, which have from time to time, and, indeed, recently, been brought into notice. Your Lordships cannot fail to appreciate the wise discretion which prompted Her Majesty's Government to choose for the difficult task of negotiating the cession and organizing the temporary Government of these Islands, one whose previous experience in the Government and organization of Crown Colonies so eminently fitted him for the duty. Sir Hercules Robinson is not only the oldest but amongst the ablest of our Crown Colony Governors, and the services he has already rendered fully justify the confidence that has been reposed upon him on this important occasion. Your Lordships will recollect that in the year 1871, at the time of the federation of the provinces in the Dominion of Canada, an arrangement was entered into as one of the conditions of Union, between the Government of the Dominion and that of British Columbia, for the construction by the former of a railway across the Continent, to be known as the Canadian Pacific Railway. By the original agreement this enterprise was to be completed within 10 years from the date of federation, and an annual sum of $1,500,000 was fixed as the minimum expenditure to be incurred in carrying out the works. Some doubts, however, appear to have arisen on the part of the Government of British Columbia as to the possibility of the conditions being fulfilled within the time specified, and a disagreement that might have resulted in serious consequences was referred to the British Government for arbitration. The question was finally amicably adjusted by a compromise, which extended the time for completion to the year 1890, and fixed the minimum annual expenditure at $2,000,000. I need hardly remind your Lordships that the Minister under whose auspices the successful federation of the Provinces was organized was my noble Friend who now presides over the Colonial Department; and he has thus, by suggesting a mode of settling this difficult question, been able to make a further contribution to the development of the resources of our dominions in North America.

Your Lordships will, I hope, excuse me, if an interest in affairs beyond sea, has led me so to intrude them on your Lordships' attention, as to leave me but little space to treat of matters at home. It is satisfactory to hear of the prosperous state of the country; and although there has been a slight falling off in trade, the prospects of the year are such as to give us no anxiety for the future.

My Lords, there is a paragraph in the Speech from the Throne which announces to your Lordships that a measure of Law Reform will be laid before you, and this I venture to think your Lordships will consider worthy of special attention. For notwithstanding our respect and admiration for the traditional and proverbial excellence of English Law, and deeply as we may venerate the abilities of those sages of jurisprudence who are and have been from time to time such conspicuous ornaments of your Lordships' ancient Assembly, yet it must be acknowledged that our present legal system, handed down as it has been from the feudal period, has collected in its growth to its present dimensions much that is superfluous, and unsuited to the exigencies of our time. By a judicious elimination of redundant matter, and by a careful analysis and reduction to a more manageable form of all that is useful and necessary in the congeries of the present system—both the study and the practice of our law will be greatly facilitated. Your Lordships' attention was called to this measure in the past Session, but time would not admit of its full discussion. Let us hope that now it may be brought to a satisfactory conclusion. And there is another measure, with the title of which your Lordships are already familiar, which provides facilities for the transfer of land. Everyone of your Lordships is aware of the great expense and waste of time entailed by the sale of land under the present system, owing to the necessity of proving title by deed. This involves the employment of the most costly professional assistance and a large element of uncertainty, causes such delay as sometimes to frustrate the object of this partial dealing, and has the disadvantage of being cumbrous from the mass of documents that have to be preserved. It is to simplify this system that your Lordships' co-operation is requested, and I feel sure it will have your consideration. Various other Bills are mentioned in Her Majesty's Speech which will be laid before you during the coming Session. I cannot but venture to think, my Lords, that the condition of external peace which has been announced to us, marks a most fitting period for the introduction of measures of social improvement at home. Besides, in the last few years more than one great measure of organic change, on the wisdom of which it is not my province to dilate, have received the sanction of the Legislature; and it would appear inevitable, that while such questions are before the country, occupying the energies and attention of all, others, which do not so readily obtrude themselves into notice but are none the less important, should be necessarily neglected. Your Lordships will, I hope, therefore, read here with satisfaction, that a group of measures relating to sanitary matters will be laid before you, as also a Bill upon Friendly Societies, all of which, if brought to a successful issue, will confer great benefits on the poorer portion of the community. Of the actual contents of these measures I am necessarily ignorant, so will merely recommend them to your Lordships' attention.

There is one more paragraph in the Speech from the Throne, to which at the risk of wearying your Lordships I would ask leave briefly to allude, as it is one which contains a question of vital importance to a large class of persons, amongst whom may be numbered many Members of your Lordships' House—I mean that which draws attention to the present state of affairs in Ireland, and announces that, in the opinion of Her Majesty's Government, the time has arrived for the reconsideration of a portion of those coercive measures which since the year 1871 have been considered necessary for the maintenance of order, and the safety of human life, in that portion of Her Majesty's Dominions. The conviction of the necessity for exceptional legislation in any part of the British Islands must have formed itself most painfully and reluctantly in all patriotic minds, and a corresponding degree of satisfaction will be felt if that necessity has ceased to exist. But, my Lords, when we look back on the catalogue of agrarian outrage and murder perpetrated in Ireland in past times, we must believe that so serious a step as any change in the direction indicated will not be taken by Her Majesty's Government except on the most indisputable evidence as to the tranquillity of the country. A protracted absence from home, and a sense of respect for your Lordships' House, alike deter me from venturing any opinion upon the state of the country. But this I may safely assert, my Lords—that no class of people in Her Majesty's dominions would be more rejoiced to find that the necessity for these coercive measures had passed away, than the country gentlemen of Ireland.

And now, my Lords, but one word more. In asking your Lordships' forgiveness for trespassing so long on your attention, I would assure your Lordships of my deep sense of the honour of being permitted now for the first time to take an active part in your deliberations. To one with so little to recommend him to your Lordships' notice as myself, your forbearance is doubly welcome; and I beg to return you my heartfelt thanks for the kind and patient hearing you have accorded me. The noble Earl concluded by moving the following humble Address to Her Majesty thanking Her Majesty for Her Majesty's most Gracious Speech from the Throne :—

MOST GRACIOUS SOVEREIGN,

"We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, in Parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Majesty for the gracious Speech which Your Majesty has commanded to be made to both Houses of Parliament.

"We humbly thank Your Majesty for informing us that Your Majesty continues to receive assurances of friendship from all Foreign Powers, and that the peace of Europe remains unbroken.

"We humbly thank Your Majesty for informing us of the termination of the Conference held at Brussels on the Laws and Usages of War, and of Your Majesty's decision not to enter into further negotiations on the subject.

"We humbly thank Your Majesty for informing us that the Prince of Asturias has been called to the throne of Spain under the title of King Alfonso XII, and that the question of formally recognizing, in concert with other Powers, the newly restored Monarchy, is under the consideration of Your Majesty's Government.

"We rejoice to learn that the exertions of Your Majesty's naval and consular servants in the repression of the East African Slave Trade have not been relaxed, and we share the hope expressed by Your Majesty that they will bring about the complete extinction of this inhuman traffic.

"We humbly thank Your Majesty for informing us that the differences which have arisen between China and Japan have been adjusted, and that the good offices of Your Majesty's Minister at Peking have been largely instrumental in bringing about this result.

"We rejoice to learn that the past year has been one of general prosperity and progress throughout Your Majesty's Colonial Empire.

"We humbly thank Your Majesty for informing us of the progress which has been made in the establishment of civil government on the Gold Coast, and that Your Majesty has procured the assent of the protected tribes to the abolition of slavery.

"We humbly thank Your Majesty for informing us that Your Majesty has found it necessary to review the sentence passed upon a native Chief in Natal, and to consider the condition of the tribes, and their relations to the European settlers and Your Majesty's Government, with the view of ensuring a wise and humane system of native administration in that part of South Africa.

"We humbly thank Your Majesty for informing us that, the King and Chiefs of Fiji having renewed the offer of their Islands unfettered by conditions, Your Majesty has thought it right to accept the cession of this territory.

"We rejoice to learn that an ample harvest has restored prosperity to the Provinces of Your Majesty's Eastern Empire, which last year were visited with famine, and that, by the blessing of Providence, the measures adopted by Your Majesty's Indian Government averted the loss of life apprehended from that calamity.

"We humbly thank Your Majesty for informing us that the state of the finances is satisfactory, and that the general prosperity of the people, supported by an excellent harvest, as well as by the recent reductions in taxation, has been fully maintained.

"We humbly assure Your Majesty that our careful consideration shall be given to the Measures which may be submitted to us, and we earnestly join in Your Majesty's prayer that our deliberations may, under the Divine blessing, result in the happiness and contentment of Your Majesty's people."

LORD RAYLEIGH: My Lords, in rising to second the Motion for the Address which has been so ably and eloquently moved by my noble Friend, I must begin by joining with my noble Friend in giving expression to the sympathy so universally felt by all classes of Her Majesty's subjects for the young Prince whose illness has deprived us of Her Majesty's most gracious presence to-day. Although the latest accounts are somewhat more favourable, the case is one which more than usually illustrates the vanity of human hopes, and even the common wish of restoration of health is sadly inapplicable. My Lords, in common with all classes of the community, your Lordships will have heard with pleasure the announcement from the Throne that the relations of this country with Foreign Powers continues to be satisfactory, and that—so far as can be judged—there is at present no cause for special anxiety as to the maintenance of the peace of Europe. This information is the more welcome as it would be idle to deny that the immense and apparently ever-increasing armaments of the Continental Powers cast a deep shadow over the future of the civilized world. It is not to be supposed that armies amounting in the aggregate to six or seven millions of men are maintained at a vast sacrifice for no purpose, or for purposes of pure defence. Although our insular position exempts us in great measure from the necessity of embarking in this ruinous competition, still the proximity of so much explosive material is decidedly dangerous, and demands on our part a renewed vigilance, and an efficient Navy, capable of acting on the shortest notice. With regard to the Brussels Conference, your Lordships have probably heard with satisfaction that Her Majesty's Ministers have found themselves unable to entertain proposals having for their object the modification of the laws of war in a direction which, however it may commend itself on humanitarian grounds, appears likely in the event of war to be disadvantageous to the action of the more free and less highly drilled nations of Europe. The paragraphs in Her Majesty's Speech relating to India and the Colonies have been so ably commented upon by the noble Earl the Mover of the Address, with all the freshness of recent experience, that I feel it unnecessary for me to add anything to what he has said on those subjects. Turning to home affairs, it is gratifying to find that, notwithstanding a slight falling off, the trade of the country is on the whole flourishing, and that an abundant harvest has made us more than usually independent of foreign supplies. After last year's immense remission of taxation, it was not to be expected that much could again be done in that direction; but the Chancellor of the Exchequer will be able to give a satisfactory account of the financial position of the country. The measures which the Government will introduce are important, and are adapted to remedy admitted evils, but are not of that blazing character which the experience of recent years has led many to expect. In some quarters the notion seems to prevail that a Government has no raison d'être, unless it has a Church to disestablish or some organic revolution to propose. Such an absurdity will scarcely impose on anyone when clearly stated. Of course, in a country like ours, and in the 19th century, when events march rapidly, changes will from time to time be necessary to meet the altered state of things; but, however inconvenient to orators and journalists a deficiency of exciting topics may be, the proverb is not far wrong which asserts the happiness of a people of whom history has little to record. In quiet times, at any rate, the first business of a Government must be to govern—to administer and improve existing laws rather than initiate daring innovations. The Bill for amending the laws relating to the transfer of land is, I believe, substantially the same as that which last year passed your Lordships' House, but failed in the House of Commons from want of time. The thorough discussion which the matter received from noble and learned Lords is a guarantee that the Bill will afford a satisfactory solution of a rather troublesome question. Among the subjects which will engage the attention of Parliament is the consolidation of the various Sanitary Acts. Those of your Lordships who have turned your attention to this question will admit the necessity of some legislation. At present there is great confusion, and the various local bodies on whom the administration largely devolves are scarcely equal to the task of interpreting intricate and sometimes almost conflicting Acts of Parliament. Of the importance of these matters there is, of course, no doubt at all; but our knowledge of the laws of health is still very scanty, and there is danger, I think, lest enthusiasts, led away by the fashion of the moment, may encourage an excessive expenditure, which may not only fail to attain its object, but excite a disgust that may prove a serious impediment in the way of future attempts at improvement. In connection with this subject we may hope that the measure to be introduced by the Government with the view of checking the great and growing evil of the pollution of rivers will deal successfully with the various difficulties with which the question is embarrassed. The Friendly Societies Bill about to be introduced—and which will be, as I understand, a modification of that of last year—deals with a subject as difficult as it is important. The function of Government in this matter is necessarily limited, but no labour will be thrown away which may tend, however indirectly, to secure from fraud or mismanagement the savings of our poorer fellow-countrymen. The increase of crimes of violence, especially in the North of England, has lately excited much public comment, and Parliament will doubtless be ready to assist Her Majesty's Government in passing any measure that may be found necessary to repress an outbreak of savagery which is a disgrace to our age and country. Your Lordships will hail with satisfaction the announcement that the Government see their way to an improvement in the laws relating to agricultural tenancies, by which the interests of all parties may be promoted. The co-operation of Parliament in a matter of such great importance may be safely relied upon by the Government. The last subject to which I will venture shortly to allude is not mentioned in the Queen's Speech, but which has excited some public interest of a non-political character—I mean the recent transit of the planet Venus. This phenomenon is of great astronomical importance, since it affords the most accurate method of ascertaining the sun's distance as well as the scale of the solar system generally; and it occurs so seldom, that the loss of one opportunity might delay the settlement of the question for more than one generation. So far as is at present known, the labours of the astronomers—in which this country has taken a large, though by no means too large a part—have been fairly successful. I cannot pass from the subject of astronomy without expressing a hope that other sciences of equal philosophical interest and even greater practical importance will receive more Government recognition than has hitherto been accorded them. It is something of an anomaly that England, whose great prosperity is largely due to scientific invention, should be slow to encourage those whose discoveries are laying the foundations of future progress. It is said, I know, that these things may be safely left to individual enterprise; but there are fields of investigation in which individuals are powerless. My Lords, the proposed despatch of an expedition to explore the Arctic regions may, I hope, be taken as an indication that these matters will not be neglected by Her Majesty's Government; and the favour with which the announcement was received proved, I think, that the people of this country are not so entirely absorbed in shop-keeping as some would have us suppose. I can imagine no better substitute for actual war in training both officers and men than the experience in evading and overcoming difficulties which such a contest with Nature is sure to afford. In conclusion, I must thank your Lordships for the kindness with which I have been received, and beg your indulgence for any indiscretion into which I may have been led by enthusiasm or inexperience. The noble Lord concluded by seconding the Address. [See page 17.]

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, it has been the custom in this House for many years to avoid, if possible, any difference of opinion in presenting an Address to Her Majesty in answer to the Speech from the Throne. This House has always been anxious to show its loyalty to the Crown, and devotion to the person of the Sovereign; and if ever there was a moment when we should be more anxious to observe this custom of agreeing to the Address it is now, when Her Majesty's anxiety about Her son is the sole reason which has prevented Her Majesty from opening this Assembly. On former occasions there has been great difficulty in obtaining this unanimity in regard to the Address. There have been great questions—there have been great wars with foreign countries, international differences of various kinds, calamities and difficulties at home or in our dependencies—still more, there have been great questions of political changes, exciting the enthusiasm of some and much alarm in the minds of others, and when it required very considerable care on the part of the framers of the Speech from the Throne and great moderation on the part of the Opposition to come to the desired conclusion. Happily, on this occasion, there are no such difficulties. There are, no doubt, questions which may be anxiously observed on the distant horizon; and although at home matters may require improvement and the attention of Parliament, yet, on the whole, there is nothing at the present moment which would render it difficult for a Prime Minister to write a Speech such as would meet with the general concurrence of Parliament. I trust that I shall have no difficulty on my own part in speaking with that moderation which I know will on this occasion be acceptable to your Lordships. I have listened with great attention to the speeches of the noble Lords who have moved and seconded the Address. I well knew the father of the noble Earl (the Earl of Donoughmore). He was one of the best men of business, one of the keenest debaters, and, I must add, one of the most troublesome of good-humoured opponents I ever met with. I cannot pay a greater compliment to the noble Earl than to say that the son has proved himself worthy of the father. With regard to the noble Lord who followed him (Lord Rayleigh), it is satisfactory when we see men who have attained the very highest distinction in their respective Universities, come down and show that they mean to take their share in the Public Business of the country:—and I for one shall not object if the noble Lord infuses a little more of the scientific element into our debates. I remember some 15 years ago an old College friend moving the Address in this House on the part of a Conservative Government. I had to follow him, and I troubled the House so far as to repeat my recollection of what happened to myself when I had the honour of moving the Address to Her Majesty in the House of Commons. I went to the Prime Minister—who referred me to other Departments. They were all most kind, but the Foreign Office sent me to the Home Office, and the Home Office to the Colonial Office. Recollecting what had happened to myself, I then ventured to suggest how my noble Friend had been inspired in his laudable search after information. As I was going out of the House, my noble Friend took my arm, and remarked that I was perfectly right in every particular, “But,” he said, “how on earth did you know it?” I am not going to risk my reputation as a diviner on the present occasion; but although many points have been properly suggested, yet there are other points on which great reticence has evidently been observed. All I can say is, that it is all the more creditable to those noble Lords to have done so well, and full allowances must be made for their difficulties on that score. With regard to the Speech itself, I entirely share in the feeling expressed by the Mover and Seconder, as to our satisfactory relations with Foreign Powers. With respect to the Conference at Brussels, I am glad that Papers are to be presented. My opinion is, that these

Earl Granville

Papers will show that the course taken by the Government has been a prudent and a right one. I am not quite sure that the reasons given here are perfectly conclusive on this point; but I have very little doubt that the Government have taken the right course in not going again into the Conference. With regard to the next paragraph, relating to Spain, objections may be made of a somewhat material character. After the abdication of King Amadeo, the late Government had to consider very frequently the question of recognizing the Government which succeeded. We acted on the principle that although the Government of other countries thought it right to recognize the new Government of Spain, yet the chief principle which should guide us was, that we should recognize it, when it had got some legal sanction from the people, or at all events, when it was pretty clear that it was acceptable or accepted by the country at large. Her Majesty's Government have followed exactly the same course. I believe that they, like ourselves, were not in the least degree favourable, but hostile, to the establishment of a Republic in this country; yet that they were not actuated by the least hostility to the Republican form of Government in Spain, if such were to be the wish of the people. In the Speech at the end of last Session, allusion was made to Spain, and reasons were given which explained why there had been no recognition of the Government of Spain up to that time. I do not blame the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby) for not having separated himself from the great majority of Foreign Governments—I have no complaint to make against the noble Earl on that point: but with regard to this paragraph, it amounts to an invitation to Parliament to discuss that which ought to be done by the Sovereign on the responsibility of her Ministers. This is altogether contrary to precedent, and I therefore think it undesirable that this paragraph should be so framed as to omit entirely any definite statement of the intentions of the Government, and to allude in these terms to what they are about to do in regard to the recognition of the Government of Spain. In the concluding sentence of the paragraph relating to Spain there is a word to which I am constrained to take exception; I think I should not have inserted the word "unfortunate," as applied to that country. It may be intended to express a very genuine sympathy; but at the same time, it is a word which is liable to be interpreted in a sense which to some is not altogether agreeable. With reference to the East African Slave Trade, I cannot but rejoice at the prospect held out to us by the paragraph relating to that subject; but while expressing my approval of that paragraph, I am bound also to express my satisfaction that the Government is not inclined to go beyond the limits indicated in the speech of the noble Earl who moved the Address. The information given by the Speech relating to the settlement of the differences between China and Japan is satisfactory, for no greater evil in that part of the world can be imagined than a war between those two countries. It is admitted that this happy result is largely due to the exertions of our able Minister in China; but the sentence in which the acknowledgment is made appears to be misplaced, for surely it is unusual to mention a Minister personally—although I do not at all deny that great credit is due to a Minister on whom the burden of a negotiation entirely rests. I hope I shall not be misunderstood if I say it is impossible for me to touch upon any point of Colonial policy in the absence of the noble Earl at the head of the Colonial Office. I entirely agree with the noble Earl (the Earl of Donoughmore) that there is not a man in this House who does not sympathize with Lord Carnarvon in the sudden and overwhelming blow that has fallen upon him. It is impossible in his absence to do justice to the grave questions involved in the paragraphs relating to Colonial matters, and I can only express a sincere hope that he will be able to bear up under his heavy trial, and to return to the House in a condition to bear his part in our discussion of them. With reference to the Finances of the country, the Chancellor of the Exchequer was thought to have been somewhat rash in anticipations which he defended by plausible arguments; and, therefore, it is exceedingly satisfactory to hear that his estimate will not be found too sanguine, and that there is ample provision for the requirements of the year. With reference to the proposed relaxation of exceptional laws in Ireland, I will not at this moment express an opinion whether the Government are right or wrong; but it is satisfactory to know that the Government are convinced that the state of Ireland is very different from what it was described to be a short time ago, that that which was spoken of as "veiled rebellion" seems to have disappeared, and that the time has come when a prudent Government may make some relaxations. It is also satisfactory to know that the Government has evinced a willingness to make whatever relaxations are possible. I have omitted to notice the handsome acknowledgment which is made in Her Majesty's Speech of the services of the Indian Government in grappling with the Famine in that country—one of the most formidable calamities which can befall any country—and we understand Her Majesty has been advised to confer a distinction on Lord Northbrook as a mark of the high admiration evoked by his energy in dealing with the emergency. The noble Marquess the Secretary of State for India has also rendered justice to Lord Northbrook in a speech he has made elsewhere; but I must remark it has also been stated that the whole credit belongs to the noble Marquess the Secretary of State. On both sides of the House it is admitted that Lord Northbrook displayed ability, sagacity, and industry, and that he resisted clamour, which made it all the more difficult for him to carry out his policy. But I am sure the noble Marquess will agree that the merit of selecting Lord Northbrook is due to the Duke of Argyll; that the instructions under which he acted were drawn up by the Duke of Argyll, and that the claim of the noble Marquess to credit is based on the fact that he made himself perfect master of the facts of the case, and, in spite of inducements to reverse the policy already adopted, he firmly supported it, and in the most public way gave his support to Lord Northbrook. I do not believe the noble Marquess intended to be unjust to the noble Duke; but it seems as if it was desired to make up for the little praise the noble Marquess received at the end of last Session by exaggerated credit in the Recess. Now—

"For transient sorrows, simple wiles, Praise, blame, love, kisses, tears, and smiles," are charming ingredients in those who have to deal with young children; but I am not quite sure that they are appropriate manifestations to be indulged in publicly as between the Prime Minister and his Colleagues. The noble Marquess has, on a recent occasion, shown his great desire to render justice to his predecessor. Coming to the long list of measures to be proposed by the Government, I read it with great satisfaction; because there have been rumours, such as are usually current before the meeting of Parliament, that some of the measures already matured in Parliament were not to be re-introduced in substantial conformity with the Bills already discussed. I am glad therefore to find that several measures which were postponed at the end of last Session will be again introduced—especially those for simplifying the Transfer of Land and completing the re-construction of our Judicial System. I am glad also to find that other measures connected with the Administration of the Law will be introduced. The value of many of the measures announced will depend upon the principles adopted in them and the manner in which they are carried out. There was another measure which last year Her Majesty's Government pledged themselves to introduce this Session, of which no mention is made in the Speech from the Throne. We are to be invited to consider a measure for improving the law as to Agricultural Tenancies; and that is a subject which can, perhaps, be treated better by a Conservative than by a Liberal Government, because a Conservative Government possesses the confidence of the landlords, and in a great degree that of the farmers, and may therefore be better able to deal with the subject in a manner satisfactory to both. My Lords, having touched thus briefly on these topics contained in Her Majesty's Speech, there are certain omissions in it to which I must for a moment advert. The first omission is with regard to the Navy. A friend of mine suggested to me this afternoon that the reason of this omission was of a very substantial character, and until contradicted, I cannot but believe that the knowledge of the state of that great service, both with regard to its admirable condition and also the great superiority of the improvements introduced, and the cheapness and excellence of all the stores, have brought the Government to feel that the First Lord last year had been led away in debate to make the assertions he did with regard to the state of the Navy. There is another omission still more important; there is no mention in the Speech of that great subject which has agitated Parliament—particularly in “another place”—so much—I mean the question of local government and local taxation. I am not going to trouble your Lordships with the list of divisions that have been taken, or the various assurances that have been given by different Members of the Government on the subject. But I think I may refer to a very distinguished deputation, with a noble Lord opposite at the head of it, which waited on the Prime Minister after he had accepted office. They stated their case, and in his answer the Prime Minister reminded them that this was a subject which he had brought before Parliament five-and-twenty years ago—a subject which he had constantly kept alive, and now that he had a real majority at his back his acts would be based upon his words. But this great subject has no place in the Royal Speech. Now, the omission of this subject must, I think, mean one of three things. Either it means that the Government are perfectly satisfied with having handed over the sum of money to the taxpayers last Session which the late Government were willing to give—or that they meant to take no action in the matter whatever—or the third alternative was, that they would hand over money from the Consolidated Fund to the taxpayers without any proper improved machinery for local government, the want of which would be a great difficulty in dealing with the subject. I think the House and the country have a right to know more clearly and definitively what are the intentions of the Government. I have now only a very few words, my Lords, to add. I have been told within the last few days that it was expected that the Liberal Party would at this moment lay down a “programme.” I do not acknowledge this claim on the Liberal Party. First of all, I do not like the term “programme”—it is more of a sensational and theatrical than a practical character, and has little reference to the sober transactions of Public Business. But I object to more than the name—I do not admit the right of anyone to make such a claim upon the Opposition. When one Party is displaced, and another likely to come into power, the country and Parliament have a right to know, in a general way at least, what are the principles and policy by which the incoming Party is likely to be guided; but I deny that this is necessary on the part of an Opposition in the present circumstances of the Liberal Party. I doubt whether the Conservative Party during the last Parliament could be accused of any marked policy, and I cannot conceive that any Party could be more triumphant than they were at the last Election. Nobody can imagine that the Liberal Party, during so many Administrations in the last 40 years, had no policy; and no one can want to know what are the principles by which the Liberal Party—now a powerless Party—are guided. What I believe the country now wants is, that we should know very clearly what is the policy of the Government—the first Conservative Government, with the exception of Lord Aberdeen's, which really commands a majority in both Houses of Parliament. What we see in the Queen's Speech is not very encouraging. The Queen's Speech at the commencement of last Session indicated various measures which it was desirable to pass into law; but the Speech at the conclusion of the Session only mentioned one of those—that with regard to the licensed victuallers—which was announced in the Speech as having been ultimately passed. What I wish to state is the course which will be taken by this side of your Lordships' House. It will not be factious. I think nobody will deny that we have no expectation of turning out the Government. I may add we have no wish to do so. I believe it is good for both Parties in turn to bear the responsibilities of office, and I also believe it is good to those in the Government that the opposition should be effectively given. We have no intention whatever of making any attack on the Government—we do not wish to do anything to embarrass them. We do not wish to press forward any measures to place them in any difficulty; but while I say this, I say also that we will keep an observant eye on the conduct and policy of the Government. I believe that is the right course for the Opposition to take, and if the Government be well conducted, that course in the end will be the more useful and honourable to them than any active opposition. If the Government bring in truly liberal measures, dealing with the questions they raise in a manner nothing different from the policy adopted by the late Government for several years, I do believe the Session will terminate happily, and we may hope that, in the concluding words of Her Majesty's Gracious Speech, our deliberations may, under the Divine blessing, result in the happiness and contentment of the people.

LORD REDESDALE said, that with reference to one of the measures announced in Her Majesty's Speech—that for completing the reconstruction of the Judicature—a very considerable change of opinion had arisen since last Session. At the present moment a great many members of the Legal Profession were taking an active course for the retention of the jurisdiction of their Lordships' House as a Court of Ultimate Appeal. He said, then, they should be extremely cautious as to what they did, for the public as well as for themselves, in this matter; and they ought to know what was the feeling of the Profession before finally determining what should be done. Last Session they had the advantage of having the opinion of the Profession in Scotland and Ireland; in both countries it was distinctly stated that the Profession was in favour of the retention of their Lordships' House as the Ultimate Court of Appeal. The Profession in England had not yet expressed a decided opinion on the subject, but he believed it would be found they were in favour of the retention of an ultimate jurisdiction by that House. Their Lordships ought also to know what the opinion of the Judges of the country was, and that also, he believed, would be found to be unfavourable to the proposed change. It was the duty of Her Majesty's Government under these circumstances to enable the House to know what was thought both by the Profession and the Judges on this important matter, and to do so before a Bill should be laid upon the Table.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND: My Lords, before I touch on the particular topics alluded to by my noble Friend opposite (Earl Granville), I would venture to add my tribute of regret at the very unfortunate and much lamented cause of the absence of Her Majesty on this occasion. I should not do justice to my own feelings, and, I am sure, to the unanimous sentiments of this House, of loyal attachment to the Throne, if I did not say how much we deplore the cause of Her Majesty's absence. I also join with my noble Friend opposite in his graceful expressions of approval of the manner in which my noble Friends behind me have acquitted themselves this evening; they have discharged with much ability what to my mind is one of the most difficult duties that a statesman can be called upon to discharge. Like my noble Friend opposite, I have a keen recollection of having had to undergo the same ordeal in the other House of Parliament—now, I am sorry to say, many years ago. I can endorse everything which my noble Friend has said on the subject, and whilst he was speaking my memory carried me back many years, till I fancied I was undergoing the operation which he described. It has frequently been my lot when I sat on the benches opposite to listen to the speeches of noble Lords selected by my noble Friend for the duty of moving and seconding the Address, and I have often been actuated by mixed feelings—admiration at the manner in which those noble Lords acquitted themselves, and regret that they were not connected with the Party to which I had the honour to belong. At present my feelings are of unmixed satisfaction, when I think that among those who are likely to give their support to Her Majesty's Government we shall have the assistance of my two noble Friends, whose mode of dealing with their task has proved them to be second to none of those who of late years have addressed us on such an occasion. Having thus expressed my gratitude to them for the manner in which they have acquitted themselves, I will only add that I venture to hope they will on many occasions be enabled to assist in the deliberations of the House by their speeches and advice. I now turn to a less agreeable part of my task—namely, to answer some objections taken by my noble Friend opposite, to the Speech which has been graciously addressed to your Lordships by Her Majesty. My noble Friend took some exception to the paragraph which dealt with the Conference held at Brussels; but, as I think his objections were in a great measure directed rather to the language of the paragraph than to the resolution which Her Majesty's Government have come to, I need not enter very minutely into details. I venture to think, however, that when my noble Friend has had the opportunity of reading the Correspondence which Her Majesty has graciously told us will be presented to this House, he will find no fault with the course which Her Majesty's Government have taken; that he will admit that the manner in which the subject has been dealt with will add fresh lustre to the character of my noble Friend who holds the Seals of the Foreign Office (the Earl of Derby), and will acknowledge, I am sure, with his usual candour, that no exception can be taken to the course which the Government have thought fit to adopt. With regard to the next paragraph, which deals with the Government of Spain, I am at a loss to know how my noble Friend can object to it. In the first place he objects that your Lordships have not been informed that the Government of Marshal Serrano had been recognized by Her Majesty's Government. The answer to that objection is very clear—namely, that all interest in the matter ceased when the Government of Marshal Serrano was de facto put an end to. It was a point which might have had some interest during the existence of the Serrano Government; but when that Government came to an end, it appears to me that it was not then for the Government to advise Her Majesty to make any reference to the subject in the Speech from the Throne. Then my noble Friend takes exception to the part of the Speech which draws attention to the fact that Alfonso XII. has been called to the Throne of Spain, and says that the question of recognizing that fact ought to be dealt with on the responsibility of Her Majesty's Government, and that we ought not to have advised Her Majesty to address the House on the subject. My Lords, we do not ask advice on that matter—we shall act on our own responsibility: but we thought it a matter of such grave importance, that we should not be dealing properly with the House or the country if we did not advise Her Majesty to treat it in the manner in which She has done. Then my noble Friend takes exception to calling Spain "an unfortunate country." But, if my noble Friend will look at the paragraph, he will see that it is called "a great, but unfortunate country;" and I will venture to ask whether a country which has been distracted by civil war and internal dissensions in the manner in which Spain has been, may not justly be called a great, but unfortunate country? I still think that Spain is both great and unfortunate, but I hope that before long Her Majesty's Government will be able to recognize her present Government, and I am perfectly certain of this—that as soon as we can with propriety do so, it is our desire to make that formal recognition. Then my noble Friend objects in a good-humoured manner to the language of the paragraph with regard to China and Japan. I think my noble Friend is somewhat hypercritical. The Speech from the Throne says—

referring to the adjustment of the late differences between those two countries. My noble Friend says it ought to be “my good offices,” and not “the good offices of the Minister.” But there were good reasons for the language which has been used. At the distance of this country from China it was perfectly impossible to give the Minister there minute instructions. He had general instructions, therefore, to promote peace if he could; and I shall be corrected by my noble Friend near me (the Earl of Derby), if I am wrong when I say that it was mainly due to the personal influence of the Minister there, that the happy result alluded to was brought about, and we thought it right that it should be known here that results so desirable had been attained by the personal influence of the Minister, and that is the reason why the paragraph has been expressed as it is. My noble Friend spoke somewhat lightly of the various measures to be introduced in the course of the Session, and rallied us on their paucity. But Her Majesty's Government think the Bills they propose to introduce will be quite as many as could possibly go through this and the other House of Parliament. I can, however, add one which is not among those mentioned in the Royal Speech. I refer to a measure of the last importance to a country so commercial and manufacturing as this. On this subject—namely, the amendment of the Patent Laws—I think, if necessary, I should be able to show that Her Majesty's Government are endeavouring to legislate in a manner perhaps not sensational, but quite as useful. I do not think I need go into the questions with regard to the transfer of Land and the re-construction of our Courts of Judicature. Last year Her Majesty's Government showed that they did desire to see the measures on this subject passed through this House. It is my earnest desire that they should pass through this House again, and no effort will be wanting on our part to that end. The objections which have been urged by my noble Friend should have been raised, I think, upon a former occasion. However, I will not be seduced into a debate upon this subject. When the time comes my noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor will, I have no doubt, be equal to the occasion, and will be able to explain and defend the measures with the same force and success which induced your Lordships to give them a third reading last year. My noble Friend alluded to one measure which he did not name. As it was an anonymous measure, I may, perhaps, fairly pass it over. I did not understand what the measure was which he said we last year gave a pledge to introduce.

EARL GRANVILLE: It related to Endowed Schools.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND: I do not say now that such a measure will not be introduced, but as it is not mentioned in the Speech, I do not think I am called upon to go into the subject—though I do not say it will not be my duty to bring forward such a measure. Next, my noble Friend spoke of the proposed Bill relating to Agricultural Tenancies, and said he trusted it would be one which would satisfy all the parties concerned. I can only say that if so it will be one of the most singular measures ever laid before Parliament. I hope, however, that at no distant date, a Bill on this subject will be submitted to your Lordships, and until that time arrives, I forbear to enter into anything like details respecting it. I do not know that there are any other topics which I am called upon to notice. I am glad to find that my noble Friend does not think it necessary to move any Amendment upon the Address. I am quite aware that such a course is by no means inconsistent with full, fair, and possibly severe criticism upon all the measures which

Her Majesty's Government may hereafter introduce. The course pursued by my noble Friend in not opposing the Address by no means precludes him from opposing either in principle or in detail any or all of these measures, if he thinks fit to do so upon becoming acquainted with their provisions. But I quite concur with him in thinking that it is better on an occasion of this sort, when it is possible to do so, to approach the Crown in a unanimous spirit, and that there should be no division of opinion upon the Address which has been moved by my noble Friend behind me. I also gratefully acknowledge the statement that my noble Friend will offer no factious opposition to the measures which Her Majesty's Government may introduce. He is possibly right in his remark that pledges given are not always observed; and I am also aware that the word "factious" is differently understood from different points of view. For example, my noble Friend might oppose some measures, and I should, perhaps, call his opposition factious, while he would say he was bound to offer such opposition from an earnest conviction that the passing of such measures would be injurious to the country. But I accept with pleasure his assurance that he will not be "factious" in his opposition, and I trust that the unanimity which has prevailed this evening is an earnest that we shall approach these measures during the Session with the calm deliberation which has always characterized, and, I hope, will always characterize your Lordships' House.

Address agreed to, nomine dissentiens, and ordered to be presented to Her Majesty by the Lords with White Staves.

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE ACT
OBSERVATIONS.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: It may be convenient to some of your Lordships to know that I propose on Tuesday next to lay again upon the Table the Bill to amend the Judicature Act of 1873, and the Bill with regard to the Transfer of Land, setting forth in detail any alterations which may be proposed in these Bills. On Thursday next I shall call attention to a consideration of the question of Letters Patent for Inventions, and will lay upon the Table a Bill to consolidate and amend the law upon that subject.

THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

MR. SPEAKER reported Her Majesty's Speech, made by Her Chancellor, and read it to the House.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HER MAJESTY'S MOST GRACIOUS SPEECH.

MR. E. STANHOPE: Mr. Speaker, Sir, a fortnight ago it seemed as if a Recess which has been fruitful in calamities might possibly terminate in a disaster which would have coloured all our proceedings to-day. One who is just entering upon manhood, and who requires only health to enable him to develop and display those talents which he undoubtedly possesses, lay upon a bed of sickness; and although, Sir, the state of his health and his devotion to studious habits has prevented Prince Leopold from being generally known to the public, it is scarcely necessary to assure Her Majesty that the people of this country, as they have always been partakers in her domestic happiness, have also, if I may say so, watched with affectionate solicitude at the bedside of her son. And I should be but an indifferent exponent of the feelings of this House if I did not venture to express our deep sympathy with Her Majesty in her long-continued anxiety, and our earnest hope that the improvement which has now begun may result in the restoration of His Royal Highness to robust health and vigour.

Sir, there is no custom more salutary than that which in the annual Speeches from the Throne, at the opening of the Session, devotes almost as large a portion of the Speech to the consideration of our external relations as to the far more exciting topic of the domestic legislation which it may be the intention of Her Majesty's Government to propose. In these days of armed nations, when Continental Governments are vieing with one another as to the greatest amount of time that they can abstract from the lives of their citizens for devotion to military duties, and as to the largest number of soldiers that can be produced from a given population, it is very necessary for us, however little we may wish to enter into such a rivalry, to be reminded that a selfish and isolated policy, such as some would urge upon us, is for us practically impossible. As Englishmen, proud of our ancient traditions, jealous of our international obligations, interested in every habitable quarter of the globe, it is impossible for us to remain indifferent spectators of the events which are passing around us. And although we may with confidence depend upon an Army which, while small, we hope to make efficient, contented, and easily capable of expansion, and upon a Navy which ought to be invincible, yet it is well for us not to neglect any one of the advantages of our insular position. Therefore, it seems to me that this country, however much it might wish to join in the very philanthropic task of mitigating the calamities of war, has observed with great satisfaction the prudence of the Foreign Secretary, when he declined to enter into the Conference proposed by Russia, without the express limitation that there should be no discussion of the usages and rules of maritime warfare. We are not in possession of the reasons for which the Government have refused to proceed further with the deliberations into which they did, in this limited way, consent to enter; but we may feel certain that Lord Derby, with the caution which has hitherto characterized him, will not allow the country in this matter to drift into difficulties.

There is no event second in importance to that which has placed the grandson of Ferdinand VII. upon the Throne of his ancestors. Young as he is, and necessarily dependent to a very great extent upon his advisers, he has a difficult and dangerous task before him. May he never forget those words which were addressed by a King of France to another young man, also aged 17, and also just setting out to assume the government of the Spanish people—"I exhort you to give them your affection, and to endeavour to gain theirs by the goodness of your Government." Called as he has been to the Throne by the voice of the people, if he can only evoke that national spirit which has before now risen superior to the greatest adversities, he may be able to conciliate political factions and calm ecclesiastical jealousies, and to deliver a distracted country from the wide-spread calamities of civil war.

But, Sir, it is not in its mention of foreign topics that Her Majesty's Speech is this year remarkable. It is the Speech of the Queen not only of these little Islands, but of a vast Empire. So vast is that Empire that most Englishmen find it extremely difficult to acquaint themselves with the various complicated questions which arise out of our colonial relations; and it must be almost impossible for a Colonial Minister, in adopting any particular policy, to feel sure that he is acting in accordance with the public feeling of this country. But I am satisfied that Her Majesty's Government, and the noble Lord who now holds the seals of the Colonial Office—to whom at this moment it is impossible to allude without a feeling of respectful sympathy—have not misinterpreted the public opinion of this country, in laying before us in detail, and without reserve, the policy which they have adopted, in the belief that it cannot fail to be deeply interesting to us. The policy of disintegration of the Empire is dead. We are no longer to be invited to look forward to a time when the Colonies shall be ready for separation, and when we are to watch that separation with simple indifference. No, Sir; a truly Imperial policy is that which regards the Colonies as an honour and an advantage to this country. We believe that they are animated by a feeling of loyalty to the Queen and of attachment to the mother country which has survived official snubs and philosophical criticism, and which it requires only a liberal and statesman-like policy to develop and confirm. In Her Majesty's Speech there is ample indication of such a policy. Why have we accepted the cession of the Fiji Islands? Not only because it gives us the possession of an unrivalled coaling station for our fleet—although that is an undoubted advantage—but because, in the interests of civilization, and in the interest of the numerous English settlers whose lives and fortunes are inextricably bound up with the future of those islands, it was impossible for us to refuse to listen to the wishes of their inhabitants. And this cession gives us the further advantage of asserting the truly English principle of the liberty of the individual; and whether in reference to kidnapping in the Pacific, the slave trade of Zanzibar, or the pawns and domestic slavery of the Gold Coast, it is clear that the Government intend to lose no opportunity of putting an end, not by an abstract Resolution of this House, but by moral influence and active negotiation, to the traffic in human life.

It is hardly possible to imagine a Speech from the Throne in which every inhabitant of this country, especially if he belong to the poorer classes, could feel a deeper interest than the one to which we have just listened, because it deals so largely with legislation which has for its object the improvement of the condition of the people. Perhaps I may be permitted specially to allude to one paragraph in Her Majesty's Speech, as being the representative of a county which is alike illustrious for its agriculture and for the uniformly good relations which prevail between landlords and tenants. Those good relations are in part, at least, due to the custom which exists in that county. It has nothing in common with the system of tenant-right in Ireland, or with that other system, so crippling to the incoming tenant, which has crept into some of our southern counties; but it aims at encouraging the tenant-farmer to put his capital into the land, and to keep it there as a permanent investment. So long ago as 1848 a Committee of this House declared that the Lincolnshire custom of compensation for unexhausted improvements was beneficial to agriculture, to the landlord, and to the tenant, stimulated the production of food, and gave increased occupation to the rural population. And it was confidently asserted that a system so desirable in itself must inevitably spread, and legislation was deprecated on the ground that it might tend to stereotype a custom which possessed this amongst other undoubted advantages—that its flexible character enabled it easily to be adapted to the requirements of particular soils, and to the improvements of modern agriculture. Sir, 17 years have passed, the custom has undergone modifications which have made it even more completely satisfactory than before both to landlords and to tenants, but it has not spread. I ought, perhaps, to apologize to the House for introducing my personal experience of this system; but it may be that the difficulties of this question can be met by an extension of the Lincolnshire custom, with proper modifications, to other counties also—although I believe that there are many more cases than are generally supposed in which the landlord, by agreement with his tenant, gives compensation for unexhausted improvements. I do not wish to make a guess at the intentions of the Government; but I am confident that when they bring forward their measure upon this subject, all of us who wish for the good of agriculture will lay aside local prejudice, and endeavour to co-operate with the Government in making it a practical one.

Passing over this somewhat special subject, I come to other measures having for their object the improvement of the condition of the people, and none can exceed in importance that which is intended to promote providence and self-help. No one can have failed to be struck with the remark made last year by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, when he said that it was lamentable to see how much good power was going to waste in this country. I think he made out a conclusive case for legislation upon the subject. And though some of us might have preferred a more comprehensive measure than the Bill of last year, at any rate the natural jealousy of the working classes against any undue interference with the management of the societies which they have had the credit of founding need not be aroused. Perhaps the main principle of the measure of last year was the diffusion of information. Publicity is imperative, because it is the only means by which the individual can decide between sound and unsound societies, between societies which are well managed, and those which are fraudulent. I remember to have read in the Preamble of one of the old Acts for the regulation of Friendly Societies, that it was “desirable to protect poor persons from the effects of fraud and miscalculation.” Ah! Sir, what a vain hope was that! I trust that we shall no longer aim at the impossible, but instead of endeavouring to protect the individual, teach the individual how to protect himself.

. There is another class of measures to which our especial attention is to be directed. The greatness of any nation, and perhaps more especially of the English nation, must depend upon the physique of its population. What has been the principal feature of our life during the last quarter of a century? It has been the depopulation of our agricultural districts. We can no longer hope, as we formerly could, to draw fresh reserves of health and strength from that quarter. Our surplus population has migrated into the towns, where the rapid increase of building and the inability of our sanitary machinery to keep pace with it has placed them in the crowded courts and alleys of our great towns under circumstances most unfavourable to physical health. It is a vast work to undertake, for we have not only to improve that condition, but to educate the mass of the people to a conviction of the importance and necessity of so doing. Every step in sanitary improvement means the expenditure of some money. At every point you are confronted by a mass of local prejudice and local self-interest which it is most difficult to overcome, until the fact is gradually realized that sanitary improvement means not only better health, but possibly also decreased pauperism, increased independence, and may perhaps shed a few bright gleams across the somewhat sombre life which it is the fate of the mass of the population to lead. Nor is this the only difficulty. Everybody believes himself capable of being a critic of your policy. Most people look upon your measures with the narrow views which an intimate acquaintance with one particular locality is apt to engender; whereas in a country of such varied conditions and habits as England, however strict your principles may be, your rules must be eminently elastic. Then, again, you must not expect immediate results from your policy. You must often look forward only to the indirect results that time—perhaps, a very long time—and the co-operation of the many wise and able and energetic men happily to be found in all parts of this country can produce. You must generally anticipate discouragement, always delay. And after all, when you appear to be making some little impression upon the work before you, some little hitch in your legislative machinery, which hardly any human foresight could have averted, brings you to a standstill. Or it may be that the fruit will ripen only when those who deserve the credit of having planted the tree shall have passed away from among us. I believe that in undertaking this difficult and unselfish work the Government will receive the co-operation of all parts of this House, and the approval of the country. The work is great. I believe it has been truly said that if all benevolent and powerful men were to co-operate for this purpose for a generation, they could hardly overtake the consequences of previous mistakes and neglect. And it is, perhaps, with youthful enthusiasm that some of us look forward to a not very remote period, when the condition of the people may be considerably ameliorated, but it is not in the idle belief that all of this—or even that much of it—can be effected by legislation—

“How small, of all that human hearts endure
That part which laws or Kings can cause or cure!”

Something, indeed, may be done; and if, when the history of the Session now opening comes to be written, the future chronicler shall find that the Parliament of to-day has not flinched from the task set before it; that it has done something to improve the condition of the people, to encourage providence and self-help, to give to them purer air, purer water, and cleaner dwellings, to stimulate the production of food, and to give to our merchant seamen greater safety; that it has endeavoured to make justice more certain by providing easier means of setting it in motion; and by establishing a Supreme Court of undoubted authority, to give satisfaction to the suitors and to steady the principles of our law—then, Sir, in the annals of our glorious history, which has made the Parliament of England an object of envy and admiration to the world, the legislation of 1875, however humble and unsensational and unheroic, may claim a not inconspicuous place.

And now, Mr. Speaker, certainly at too great length, but, I hope, without indiscretion, I have discharged the duty which I can assure the House I have not undertaken without a due sense of its difficulty and responsibility. And if I have abstained from prefacing my observations with any appeal for the indulgence of this House, it has not been because I have felt the need of it less than any one of my predecessors; it is because experience has shown that that indulgence, almost before it is asked for, is always in these cases freely and liberally bestowed. My anticipation has been realized in a manner for which I beg to offer to the House my heartiest thanks. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving—

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, to thank Her Majesty for the Most Gracious Speech delivered by Her Command to both Houses of Parliament:

“Humbly to thank Her Majesty for informing us that Her Majesty continues to receive assurances of friendship from all Foreign Powers, and that the peace of Europe remains unbroken:

“Humbly to thank Her Majesty for informing us of the termination of the Conference held at Brussels on the Laws and Usages of War, and of Her Majesty’s decision not to enter into further negotiations on the subject:

“Humbly to thank Her Majesty for informing us that the Prince of Asturias has been called to the throne of Spain, under the title of King Alfonso XII., and that the question of formally recognising, in concert with other Powers, the newly-restored Monarchy, is under the consideration of Her Majesty’s Government:

"To assure Her Majesty that we rejoice to learn that the exertions of Her Majesty's Naval and Consular Servants in the repression of the East African Slave Trade have not been relaxed, and that we share the hope expressed by Her Majesty that they will bring about the complete extinction of this inhuman traffic :

"Humbly to thank Her Majesty for informing us that the differences which had arisen between China and Japan have been adjusted, and that the good offices of Her Majesty's Minister at Peking have been largely instrumental in bringing about this result :

"To assure Her Majesty that we rejoice to learn that the past year has been one of general prosperity and progress throughout Her Majesty's Colonial Empire :

"Humbly to thank Her Majesty for informing us of the progress which has been made in the establishment of civil government on the Gold Coast, and that Her Majesty has procured the assent of the protected tribes to the Abolition of Slavery :

"Humbly to thank Her Majesty for informing us that Her Majesty has found it necessary to review the sentence passed upon a Native Chief in Natal, and to consider the conditions of the Tribes and their relations to the European Settlers and to Her Majesty's Government, with the view of ensuring a wise and humane system of Native Administration in that part of South Africa :

"Humbly to thank Her Majesty for informing us that the King and Chiefs of Fiji having renewed the offer of their Islands unfettered by conditions, Her Majesty has thought it right to accept the cession of this Territory :

"Humbly to assure Her Majesty that we rejoice to learn that an ample harvest has restored prosperity to the Provinces of Her Majesty's Eastern Empire, which, last year, were visited with famine, and that by the blessing of Providence the measures adopted by Her Majesty's Indian Government averted the loss of life apprehended from that calamity :

"Humbly to thank Her Majesty for informing us that the Estimates for the approaching financial year will be laid before us without delay, that the condition of the finances is satisfactory, and that the general prosperity of the People, supported by an excellent harvest as well as by the recent reductions in taxation, has been fully maintained :

"Humbly to assure Her Majesty that our careful consideration shall be given to the measures which may be submitted to us, and that we earnestly join in Her Majesty's prayer that our deliberations may, under the Divine blessing, result in the happiness and contentment of Her Majesty's People."

MR. WHITELAW : In rising to second the Motion which has just been made, let me say that I could not have presumed to occupy the position I now do, but from a sense that in my being called to do so, there was conveyed a compliment to the important constituency for which I have the honour to be one of the Members. I feel assured of the usual indulgence of the House to one in my position, and I will endeavour not to tax its patience. The topics in the Speech refer mainly to the action and experiences of the Government since we last met, and to the measures to be submitted on Government authority. Let me refer to some of these. Touching Spain, where the Government of Marshal Serrano has been displaced, and the Prince of the Asturias called to the Throne as Alfonso XII., we are informed the Government are considering, in concert with other Powers, the formal recognition of him as King. The public prints inform us that some other countries have already recognized the new order of things. The quietness with which the change was effected, and the apparently large concurrence of opinion in support of it, give, let us hope, good ground for believing that the future of this noble, though often distracted, country will be distinguished by stability of government and by the establishment of that confidence which is the necessary guarantee for progress, in the development of her rich resources, so full of promise for the increase of her own wealth and of her business relations with other countries. The House will be pleased to be informed of the settlement of the difficulties between China and Japan, which it at one time appeared must result in a war. Recent news state that the Treaty has already been given effect to by the Japanese withdrawing the army they had placed on Formosa, and by the Chinese paying the sums agreed on. Our satisfaction with this settlement is justly increased by the knowledge that it was mainly brought about by the wise counsels and good offices of Mr. Wade, Her Majesty's Representative. During last year this country regarded with approval the cautious procedure of the Government in reference to the Conference at Brussels. It has been arranged to hold this year at St. Petersburg a Conference having similar objects in view. Our Government, not recognizing that good results of importance were likely to be arrived at, has declined to take part in the Conference. The progress of civilization and the force of enlightened public opinion may, I think, be trusted to secure all that the Conference can secure in mitigation of the horrors of war. There are probably larger questions than that involved, the bearing of which we may fear would be to weaken the smaller Powers in case of invasion, and to reduce the importance of naval strength. The country will approve the action of the Government, and will not, I think, be likely to countenance changes which might cripple the power of any country to defend its independence, or which would hinder those who are attacked in war from making the best use of every advantage they possess or can command. It is very satisfactory to observe the energetic endeavours which are being made by Her Majesty's naval and consular agents for the putting an end to the Slave Trade on the East Coast of Africa. Though the Sultan of Zanzibar does not represent a great Power, yet he occupies a position which enables him to be, in combination with Great Britain, a power of importance in putting down this Slave Trade. The horrors of the trade will be present to the minds of all, especially at this time, when we have but recently had presented to us the last journals of Dr. Livingstone. The devastations wrought by the slave traders in the interior of Africa, as told by Dr. Livingstone, are appalling. The revelations of that devoted man inspire an ardent desire to work for the breaking down of this horrible system. As an outcome of this desire, missions, or rather little colonies, are being organized to proceed to Africa, to carry on work in the country traversed by Livingstone. These colonists are to engage in the spreading of the Gospel, and also in the teaching of industries to the Natives. The promoters of these missions or colonies regard it as a special inducement to their proceeding with the undertaking, that by settling them on the track of the slave traffic, they expect to contribute materially to the stopping of the traffic and of the horrors connected with it. It is satisfactory to have the prospect of many efforts conducing to the same good end. Nothing will accord more with our national sentiment than arrangements for effectually ending this trade. I am persuaded the House will be glad to hope that the influence of the Sultan of Zanzibar, and every available influence, will be joined with that of the Government of this country for the extinction of the Slave Trade on the East Coast of Africa. It is most gratifying that the very grave Famine pressing upon part of India a year ago has been met with so much energy, attended with so much success. Let us render thanks that the Government of India have been enabled to devise and work out schemes of relief, which have resulted in carrying the stricken people through the famine with, I may say, no loss of life. Doubtless, there was much suffering and privation, and a few died from the effects of the Famine, but the common annual death-rate was not exceeded. The nation was deeply touched by the trials overshadowing part of India last year, and was possessed by the intensest concern that every possible endeavour should be made to avert the bitterness of the impending calamity. The voluntary giving of our people was but a feeble expression of the interest the nation felt. Yet that voluntary giving could not fail to touch the Native mind with a grateful knowledge that British hearts felt for Indian woes, and desired to be present with the sufferers with comfort and relief. The discussion upon Fiji in this House last Session left us all prepared for the announcement, now formally made, that the Fiji Islands have been annexed to Great Britain as a new colony. The offer of cession was unconditional, and the Crown enters on possession untrammelled with conditions. I think there will be a general approval of the action of Government, and of the addition to our Colonial Empire of these Islands, which are very fertile in valuable productions, and which offer so good and suitable a station for shipping on the highway between Australia and North America. Last Session there was anxiety exhibited lest the settlement of Gold Coast affairs might prove to be not conformable to the sentiments of this country. The information given us in the

Speech concerning affairs at the Gold Coast is most re-assuring, and should lead us all to mark with approval the result of the work of the Colonial Office. It has made good progress in establishing a satisfactory rule in the Protectorate, and far from confirming or countenancing slavery, it has succeeded in inducing the protected tribes to agree to the abolition of it. Her Majesty's Speech informs us that the House will be consulted as to certain Acts which specially affect Ireland. These Acts were passed in the interests of public peace and security in Ireland. We have public peace and security in Ireland. No doubt there are those—perhaps, not a few—who will be disposed to allege that the present peace and security are due to the influence of these Acts. Ireland is tranquil. Tranquillity without such Acts accords more with the spirit of our institutions, and I am sure the House generally will be pleased that a measure is to be submitted to the consideration of Parliament, aiming at dispensing with the continuance of some of these Acts, or some parts of them. Whatever length the measure submitted may go, I am sure the House will be glad to go into resigning some of these guarantees for peace hopefully for the future—that is, hoping that Irish patriotism and Irish loyalty will prove fully equivalent to the removal of existing abnormal legislation, and that the absence of crime in Ireland will continue to prevail. For Scotland a Land Transfer Act was passed last year, and a most valuable measure it is. I trust the Land Transfer Bill now to be introduced will be perfected by Parliament, and this year become law. Touching the Judicature Acts, I would like simply to remark that if in the wisdom of Parliament, the Court of Final Appeal is to be removed from the House of Lords for other parts of the country, it will not be prudent for Scotsmen to suggest a different Court for Scotland. But I desire to take this opportunity of saying what I believe Scotsmen generally will support me in—namely, that Scotland has viewed with complete confidence and satisfaction, the discharge by the House of Lords of the functions of the Final Court of Appeal. As to the Landlords and Tenants Bill, it is perhaps too purely an English matter for me to appreciate it fairly. Besides, we do not know what it is to be. I confess myself strongly predisposed to think that it would be well if landlords were induced to execute and pay for all improvements of a permanent nature—the landlords receiving compensation therefor from the tenants, in the shape of increased rent. Whatever may be the provisions of the Bill, I am sure the House will be glad to have the matter brought before them on the responsibility of Government. General satisfaction will, I think, be felt with the proposal to establish in England the office of Public Prosecutor. The Bills relating to the Consolidation of Sanitary Acts, Artizans' Dwellings in Towns, and Pollution of Rivers, are Bills which the country will be especially satisfied are to be introduced. The need for such legislation is clamant, and it is well that Parliament should, in the absence of exciting political topics, devote itself to the consideration of the problem—how best to secure the health of the population, and also the purification of our rivers, alike for the purposes of health and for the purposes of industry and commerce. The number of sanitary Acts is confusing. The consolidation of them will make it possible, I hope, for ordinary people, with reasonable application, to know the sanitary law, and to make themselves of use in the working of it out. Concerning dwellings in towns, it is universally admitted that, in many places, dwellings are terribly crowded together; in other words, that the number of people living on an acre, or on a given space, is excessive, and is most detrimental to the health of the community. The number of people living in one dwelling is an important element, affecting the health of the inmates; but probably a worse evil than that of too many people in each dwelling is the crowding of dwellings closely together—there, probably, the two evils are combined. There, sunshine cannot enter, and fresh air cannot circulate. Not only do such places exist, but I am afraid it is too true that houses but lately erected—houses now being erected—are liable to the same objections. Besides the overcrowding of houses, there are many defects in construction that might very properly be remedied by the enforcement of rules. The very high death-rate in some towns demands immediate action, to provide not only against the perpetuation of existing evils, but also against the increase of the area of population presenting the conditions recognized as supporting a high death-rate. No doubt, there are many competing theories as to the causes of a high death-rate; but I do not think any of them will reject as essential elements in a remedy:—1st., a sufficient open area adjoining houses or a limited population per acre; 2nd., restrictions as to the laying out of ground, so as to secure the free circulation of air; 3rd., the enforcement of conditions in construction calculated to secure for the several dwellings independent ventilation, and such isolation as would prevent the intercommunication of the air of different dwellings; 4th., the watchful control of the connections of dwellings with sewers—or what may be better—the prevention of such connections. Houses are being erected in blocks elsewhere than in towns. Each block may be the nucleus of a new town. It will be well to consider whether the operation of this Bill should not be extended to blocks or ranges of houses in the country, so as to secure generally, in connection with houses, the physical conditions favourable to health. The City of Glasgow has, for years, been working out its city improvement scheme. A Private Bill was promoted and an Act got giving Commissioners power to purchase compulsorily the property within the limits of certain localities described in the Act. These localities were the most densely-peopled parts of the city. Great works have been carried out—in the purchase of the properties, in the demolition of old houses horribly huddled together; in forming wide streets, and in laying out the ground adjoining these streets for the construction of new buildings. The people displaced by the demolitions have moved into other quarters, and occupy better and larger houses, and pay higher rents. The average density of the population per acre over the city has been, by the operations of the trust, changed for the better; yet the death-rate of Glasgow is very high. The moral and physical deterioration of the people, induced by long-continued over-crowding, is not to be remedied immediately. Time and perseverance in remedial measures are necessary. The rectification of such evils all over the country is no light matter, and will take time, even if followed out with the most earnest perseverance. The consideration and discussion of this subject, resulting in the passing of an Act that would secure for town and country the amendment of such existing evils, and that would induce the abundant provision of houses meeting proper sanitary conditions, would be a work of the highest importance to the nation, and consequently one on which Parliament might most profitably employ its time. I anticipate there is work of this kind to be put before us in these Bills, and believe the House will be glad that such is the case. In the matter of the pollution of rivers a most difficult problem is presented. The law does provide they should not be polluted, but a great hindrance to the beneficial operation of the law is the difficulty, not yet satisfactorily overcome, of not knowing how to dispose of that which causes the pollution. A commission has been appointed to examine and report as to the purification of the Clyde. The report, let us hope, will throw light on the solution of this important difficulty. It does not appear that the very bad state of the Clyde raises the death-rate in the districts abutting on the river, yet who will undertake to say that the offensive exhalations from it would not in case of some epidemics greatly increase the gravity of the danger threatening the population? In any case it will be considered essential that the abominable condition of the river should not continue, and that measures be taken which will restore its waters to a tolerable state of purity. As with the Clyde, so with other rivers. That a Merchant Shipping Bill is to be introduced by the Government will be hailed with satisfaction. The subject has been for a long time before the country. The whole nation is deeply interested in all that concerns merchant shipping, and will expect the time and attention of the House to be given to the perfecting this Session of a measure well calculated to secure the greatest safety in voyages, and the development of a British Mercantile Marine of the highest character. There had in some quarters been so much said concerning the Labour Laws that it was thought necessary a year ago to appoint a Royal Commission to inquire into and report upon them, in order that they might be considered calmly and reasonably, in the light of the full information to be communicated to Parliament by the Commission. The labours of the Commission are not yet completed, but it is expected the Commission will issue a final Report soon. The impression will, I think, be a common one—that the importance attached to the complaints respecting the operation of these laws is not borne out by the evidence supplied in the Report thus far issued by the Commission. When we are put in possession of the final Report, and Government submits the measure referred to in the Speech, I am sure the House will address itself with care to the consideration of the measure, having in view the securing of the implement of contract by both employer and employed, and of complete freedom to everyone to guide himself in the conduct of his own affairs without being overborne in any case by intimidation or constraint. I feel I ought to apologize to the House for having occupied so much of its time. I thank the House for the patience with which they have heard me, and beg to second the Motion for the adoption of the Address made so ably by my hon. Friend beside me, the Member for Mid Lincolnshire.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That, &c.” [See page 44.]

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Mr. Speaker—Sir, I am confident that upon this occasion, if upon no other, I shall express the feelings of every Gentleman who sits upon this side of the House when I say that we all, without exception, cordially concur in that expression of sympathy with Her Majesty which was so well addressed to the House by the hon. Member who moved the Address for the anxiety which she has lately undergone through the illness under which Prince Leopold has laboured. As we understand, it was Her Majesty's intention to have opened Parliament in person, had she not been prevented doing so by that anxiety. And I am sure, Sir, that it needs no words from me, or from any Member of this House, to assure Her Majesty how deep is the interest which is felt, not only here, but throughout the country, in everything that affects her own welfare and happiness, and that of the family which is so well known among us.

Sir, in the circumstances under which it becomes my duty to rise at this early period of the debate—circumstances which, I believe, are known to most hon. Members of this House—it is hardly, I hope, necessary for me to ask the House to extend to me its forbearance and consideration. I am as well aware as any hon. Member can be, that, standing in this place where, within my own recollection, I have seen Lord Palmerston, the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Disraeli), and my right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone), I cannot hope or pretend to take the part which was taken by those distinguished men—I cannot hope to take the part which they have taken in the discussions of this House, or to exercise the influence they have exercised over its deliberations. But, at the same time, I am aware that it may be for the convenience of the House, and that it may tend to the despatch of Public Business, that there should be some individual who shall be to some extent responsible for the conduct of Public Business on the part of hon. Members on this side of the House; and if my humble services can in any way tend to the convenience of the House or to the despatch of Public Business, I can only assure the House that, however inefficient, those services will be cheerfully rendered. I have now the satisfaction of passing from this subject, and I hope that it may never again be necessary for me to advert to a subject which must be so unimportant and uninteresting to the House as anything personal to myself must be.

And now, with the permission of the House, I will make a few observations upon the Speech from the Throne which we have just heard read, and upon the Address that has been moved in reply to it. On former occasions a great part of the discussion on the Speech from the Throne has usually turned upon some event or events which have happened since the previous prorogation of Parliament either within the United Kingdom itself or abroad, but with which this country has been more or less directly interested; but I am happy to say that upon the present occasion it will not be necessary for me to dwell at length upon anything which has occurred in the United Kingdom since we were last assembled here. Fortunately, the condition of our own country, and that of Europe also, has been one of the most complete tranquillity, and nothing that I am aware of has taken place that will call for notice this evening. Indeed, I might have passed by altogether the allusions made in the Address to our foreign policy, had it not been that I wish to call attention for a moment to what appears to me to be a somewhat remarkable paragraph in Her Majesty's Speech referring to the recognition of the Government of Spain. The House is well aware that a Republic had been for a very considerable time established in that country; that various statesmen had been at the head of that Republic; and that for some months that Republican Government was presided over by Marshal Serrano. So far as I am aware neither the Republic nor the Government of Marshal Serrano had been formally recognized by our Government, nor had any question arisen as to what steps towards recognition should be taken. But, unfortunately, the change in the form of foreign Governments is so frequent that our Foreign Office has no lack of precedents to guide it in such matters—in fact, it would not be difficult to lay down something like an absolute rule which might usually guide the proceedings of our Foreign Secretary in such matters. That rule, I take it, would be that upon a change in the form of the Government of a foreign State, recognition is seldom immediately accorded to the new form of Government until we have some assurance that such Government is not only a de facto Government, but that it has met with that amount of acceptance from the people of the country as to give it at least a prospect of being a permanent one. On the other hand, I take it that the rule would be not to withhold our recognition from a new Government, which had a prospect of being permanent, merely because of any objection which we might entertain to the form of such Government or to its policy. That rule does not appear to have been exactly followed on the present occasion. As far as I am aware, there is nothing to show that the Government of Marshal Serrano was accepted by the people of Spain to any greater extent at the moment of recognition than it had been for some time before. The Cortes had been dissolved, and a great part of the country was still subject to civil war. I admit that considerable embarrassment might have been occasioned had we separated ourselves from the course which was taken by other nations in this matter; and I do not know that it would have been necessary for me to call the attention of the House to the subject at all, if Her Majesty's Government themselves had not invited criticism upon it by the paragraph relating to it in the Queen's Speech. The House will observe that in that paragraph the Government have not stated the action they have taken in reference to the subject, and have passed over in silence the fact of the recognition of the Government of Marshal Serrano. They have not given us, nor even promised to give us, any information with respect to that recognition, nor the terms upon which it was accorded; but they do proceed to give us an invitation of a somewhat novel character. The Government, in that paragraph, say—

That appears to me to be an invitation to the House of Commons to assist the Government in arriving at a decision as to the recognition by this country of the Government of King Alfonso. If that be the case, and if the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government does really ask the House of Commons to give him its advice upon a matter not usually coming within its cognizance, I trust that he will at least take measures to lay upon the Table such Papers as may be necessary to enable it to form an opinion on the subject.

I concur to a very great extent in the eloquent passage in the speech of the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. E. Stanhope) in moving the Address, in which he refers to our Colonies. There are but few observations which I think it necessary to make upon that part of the Speech from the Throne which relates to that subject. With regard to the paragraph in the Speech which relates to the affairs of Natal, the House will probably be of opinion that all discussion upon the subject should be postponed until the Papers which have been promised have been laid upon the Table. The House will, however, observe that the proceedings of the Government of that Colony are spoken of in terms of very considerable severity. Although I have no reason whatever to think that the conduct of the Colonial Office in relation to the subject has been other than we can approve, I am sure it will be with very great regret that the House, after perusing the Papers, will come to the conclusion that up to the present moment we have not succeeded in establishing a wise and humane system of native administration in that part of our Empire. I have no doubt that, although we have no promise to that effect, Papers relating to our acceptance of the cession of Fiji will be laid upon the Table. The Government should be very grateful to the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire for having given a much better reason for our acceptance of that cession than appears to be given in the Speech from the Throne. I would not object to the cession of the Islands; but still, if we are to accept every cession of territory that is offered in every part of the world, which may offer important maritime advantages to our fleets, we may be entering upon a career of very considerable territorial acquisition. The hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire omitted—and I regret that in such a speech, so comprehensive and so eloquent, he should have omitted to mention a passage in Her Majesty's Speech that refers to the affairs of India. The House will look—and I am sure it will not look in vain—to the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, to express in befitting terms its sense of what it owes to the Indian Government of Lord Northbrook for having so admirably met the calamity of the great Indian Famine. On behalf, however, of Lord Northbrook's Colleagues who sit on these benches near me, I cannot refrain from offering my humble tribute to the energy and fortitude with which he grappled throughout with that grave difficulty, and to the moral courage with which he took his own course, in opposition sometimes to authority of very great weight. He has done enough, and not more than enough, to save the afflicted provinces, without unnecessarily disturbing trade or demoralizing the people by undue assistance.

Sir, the House will be glad to learn that the condition of the finances is satisfactory—at all events, the expenditure of the year will be met by the Revenue; and it would be still more satisfactory if we could be assured that the expression in Her Majesty's Speech has some prospective, as well as present significance, especially when it is coupled with the somewhat ominous omission from the preceding paragraph of all mention of economy. But I can hardly imagine that Her Majesty would have been advised to inform Parliament that the finances of the country were in a satisfactory state, if Her Majesty's advisers knowing as they do, though we do not, the necessity of the demands which will be made on us during the coming year, were of opinion that the wants of the coming year could not be met without having recourse to fresh taxation. If my supposition is correct, it must be a subject of congratulation to the House, and certainly to my late Colleagues who sit near me, that, in spite of the distressing announcements which have been made out-of-doors, as to the state of the Army, and notwithstanding the somewhat alarming assurances which we heard within these walls last year from the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Admiralty (Mr. Hunt), those services can, in the opinion of Her Majesty's present advisers, be placed or maintained in the necessary state of efficiency without, at all events, any very large addition to the demands that have to be made upon Parliament.

Before I turn for a moment to the measures to which our attention is called in Her Majesty's Speech, there is one inquiry which I think it would be interesting to the House to make—namely, how far it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government, or how far it is within their power, to provide that the course of business shall correspond with the programme which they have laid before us. That inquiry, I think, will not appear altogether idle when we look to the results of last Session. The House will recollect that at the opening of last Session our attention was called to a measure affecting the law for the transferring of land; another for the extension to Ireland of the Judicature Act; certain Scotch Law Bills, and one for the amendment of the Licensing Act; and, further, a hope was held out that although a Commission had been appointed to inquire into the relations between masters and servants, it would be yet possible for the Government to deal with the subject in that Session. Now, in the Speech at the prorogation there were only two of those measures—namely, the Scotch Bill, and the one for the amendment of the Licensing Act—mentioned as having become law; and the two in question had not received Her Majesty's assent in the form in which they had been originally submitted. That Session, however, had by no means been an idle one; indeed, Her Majesty was advised to speak in terms of considerable satisfaction with regard to the legislative achievements of the Session. A paragraph of the Speech to which I am referring was devoted to the Act for the improvement of the health of women and children employed in factories. That was, I believe, an admirable Act; but for the introduction of that measure the Government were not responsible, and the passing of it was mainly due to my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella); to whom I have no doubt Her Majesty's Government will readily give the credit he deserves. The Scotch Patronage Bill, which also passed, was the result apparently of an after-thought, but was certainly important enough to have merited mention in the Speech at the opening of Parliament. Whether it was the result of a happy thought is, perhaps, more doubtful, seeing that it has already given occasion to a considerable agitation for the disestablishment of the Church of Scotland—a matter upon which but little had been heard before. Well, the Public Worship Bill had also a paragraph devoted to it, but for the introduction of that Bill we were not indebted to Her Majesty's Government; and the warmth of the support which it received from the right hon. Gentleman opposite—I can hardly say from the whole of Her Majesty's Government—seemed to date from the time when it became clear that its provisions would be extremely acceptable to the House; I should be unwilling to say that the Government adopted the Bill in consequence of the unpopularity which seemed to attach to the counter-propositions of my right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich. There is one other Bill I must refer to, and must make an inquiry of the right hon. Gentleman opposite about. I should wish to ask him whether the absence of all mention of the Endowed Schools Act is accidental; whether it has not been considered of sufficient importance to be alluded to in the Queen's Speech; or whether the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government has repented of the pledge he gave in regard to it. That pledge—which was given in answer to the hon. Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Beresford Hope) and the hon. Member for West Kent (Mr. Talbot)—was to the effect that the clauses of the Bill which were withdrawn were not dropped, but simply postponed. It would, I think, be satisfactory to the House to know what are the intentions of the Government on that subject. Well, Sir, I have made this reference to the work of last Session to show that, at all events at that time, Her Majesty's Government were not disposed to exercise a very strict control over the course of business in the House. I should like to know—and I think that the House would like to know—whether we are expected to devote our attention seriously to the measures enumerated in the Speech from the Throne, or whether there is a probability that such measures may be set aside to make room for much less useful but more sensational legislation.

Turning for the moment to those measures referred to in the Speech from the Throne, I come to a reference to the—“Various statutes of an exceptional or temporary nature now in force for the preservation of peace in Ireland.”

That paragraph seems to me somewhat vague; but I need hardly say that no one will rejoice more than the Gentlemen on this side of the House if, acting upon their responsibility and with the full information that they possess as to the condition of Ireland, Her Majesty's Government find themselves justified in proposing a considerable revision of those measures; and it is equally unnecessary to say that we should still more rejoice if that policy should prove successful in its results. Referring to Ireland, I hope that whilst those who sit near me will be willing to do justice to the Duke of Abercorn and his Colleagues for the energy, fairness, and impartiality of their Irish administration, Her Majesty's Government also will not be unwilling to do justice to their predecessors, by admitting that upon the present Government taking office they found the country was in that state of prosperity and freedom from crime which the Lord Lieutenant has more than once admitted, and which has enabled them to offer this great measure of conciliation to the people of Ireland.

With reference to the other measures mentioned in the Speech, I think I need trespass but for a very short time upon the attention of the House. A Bill relating to the transfer of land, and one to complete the re-construction of the Judicature were sacrificed last Session, although they had been introduced by the Government itself, to make room for some of those other measures to which I have already adverted, and I understand that it is not improbable that the difficulties which the Government have to deal with in passing these measures have been not a little increased by the delay; but I trust it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to prosecute them in earnest during the present Session. Bills are promised for the improvement of the dwellings of the working classes in large towns, for the consolidation and amendment of the sanitary laws, and for the prevention of the pollution of rivers. I must, in referring to this paragraph, congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hastings (Mr. Kay-Shuttleworth) upon the effect which his able statement of last Session has had upon Her Majesty's Government, and I will congratulate the Government on the promptitude with which they have acted on the suggestion then made. I agree with the hon. Member who seconded the Address (Mr. Whitelaw), and who referred to what had been done in this direction at Glasgow, and I have no doubt that he and other Scotch Members who sit on both sides of the House will be able to give Government valuable assistance in perfecting the measure. No information has been given as to the character of the measure; but I trust it will proceed upon the lines of the local Acts of Glasgow and Edinburgh, and will enable the municipalities or local bodies of large cities to make the necessary and required improvements. I think that when Government comes to deal with the improvement of dwellings in large towns, and with the prevention of the pollution of rivers, it is probable they will find that their labours would have been greatly simplified, and would have promised more satisfactory results, if something had been done to improve the present system of local administration. It is possible that their well-meant efforts will tend to increase the confusion which it is admitted at present exists in connection with the work of local bodies. I hope that the Report of the Royal Commission that was appointed to inquire into the state and working of the laws with regard to trade is ready, or nearly so, to be presented to Parliament, and that legislation on the subject will not be long delayed. It is a subject that nearly touches the interests and even the liberties of a very large number of our fellow-subjects; it is a question on which large masses of our working population feel deeply and feel strongly; and judging from the opinions of others who are more competent to deal with it than I am, it is one upon which they have a right, to some extent, to feel aggrieved. I therefore venture to express an earnest hope, on behalf of myself and those who sit near me, that Her Majesty's Government will make an effort to deal with the question this Session.

Sir, I cheerfully admit that there can be no Government better fitted to deal with the question of Agricultural Tenancies than the present Government. I trust they will take it up—as I have no reason to doubt they will take it up—in a fair and liberal spirit; considering as much the case of the tenants as that of the owners of land, and considering also as much the case of the consumers as that of the producers of food. It may be doubtful whether there is room for great change in these respects. As I have said, there is no body better fitted to deal with the subject than the present Government, and I am sure that the House will cordially co-operate with them in considering any well-constructed measure with reference to it.

Having now briefly glanced at some of the measures enumerated in Her Majesty's Speech, there is one topic that is omitted from it on which I should like to say a word. Sir, the House will have observed that there is no mention whatever in the Speech of the subject either of Local Government or of Local Taxation, and I think their omission, especially the omission of Local Taxation, is a matter that must excite surprise in the minds of hon. Gentlemen opposite. Both the votes and the speeches of right hon. Gentlemen opposite, declared alike in opposition and in office, certainly would have led to the impression that they intended that this subject would not have been "conspicuous by its absence" on this occasion. In 1872, the right hon. Gentleman opposite, with, I believe, the whole of his Colleagues, voted for the Resolution of the hon. Member for South Devon (Sir Massey Lopes), which declared—

"That it is expedient to remedy the injustice of imposing Taxation for National objects on one description of property only, and therefore that no legislation with reference to Local Taxation will be satisfactory which does not provide, either in whole or in part, for the relief of occupiers and owners in counties and boroughs from charges imposed on ratepayers for the administration of justice, police and lunatics, the expenditure for such purposes being almost entirely independent of local control."

And in the course of the debate on that Motion the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government said—

"This question, it must be remembered, has been actively before us for at least a quarter of a century. When it was first introduced to the notice of the House, the burdens of real property, though considerable, were by no means as excessive as at present; but during that period the expenses of the possessors of real property have constantly increased for public purposes, their control over that expenditure having almost proportionately diminished."—
[3 Hansard, cex. 1397.]

Again, in making his Financial Statement last year, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer made this declaration—

"But it is not simply because we have taken an interest in it, or because we have taken a course which pledges us to give early attention to the subject, that we put it first in the list of objects of consideration. We put it first because it seems to us, upon the whole, the object of the highest national interest at the present time. . . . But it now seems to us that there is another side to the question of Finance which stands as much in need of attention and reform as did the side of indirect taxation in the days of Sir Robert Peel and in the year 1842, and that is the great question of our direct, and especially of our direct local, taxation."—

And he prefaced the proposal he was then about to make by these words—

"We intend, therefore, to make proposals with regard to the relief of Local Taxation in the present year. They must be regarded not as absolutely final, but as proposals which we think will meet the present emergency, and will to a great extent facilitate what we may have to do hereafter."—[Ibid. 657.]

Sir, the right hon. Gentleman then proceeded to make certain proposals, and he gave relief to the ratepayers to the extent, I think, of about £1,000,000. But what is to be inferred from the absence of all mention of this subject in the present Speech? Are we to understand that the proposals of the Government last year were final proposals; or are we to understand that the consideration of the question has been indefinitely postponed? Or, in the third place, are we to understand that, the attention of Parliament having been previously called to the whole subject, the course of last year is to be again repeated, and further relief is to be given to the ratepayer, without making any attempt to deal with the question of the improvement of Local Administration? Now, if either of the first two courses are contemplated by the Government—that is to say, if their proceedings of last year are to be understood as final, or if there is to be an indefinite postponement of the subject—I think that would be an announcement which would certainly not recommend itself to the supporters of the right hon. Gentleman opposite. The late Government proposed to make concessions to the ratepayers to the amount of £1,200,000. That proposal was not accepted as satisfactory by right hon. Gentlemen opposite; and I cannot believe that the ratepayers will be willing to accept from those who have always professed themselves their warmest friends a smaller amount of relief than was rejected with something like scorn from Gentlemen who sit on this side of the House. But if the third course is contemplated by the Government, and we are this year to have a repetition of the policy of last year, I cannot but think it is a course that is open to the very gravest objection. We on this side of the House took but little exception to that course last year, because we yielded to the arguments of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who pleaded that he had not had time to consider the whole subject, and at the same time was unwilling to distribute the whole of his large surplus without granting some relief to the ratepayer. But the Government have now had time, if they choose to consider the whole question. The question of Local Administration as well as that of Local Taxation is one which is almost universally admitted to require, and must receive soon, a searching examination. There is confusion of the area of rating, there is inequality in the incidence of rating, there is confusion and want of unity and waste of power in connection with the local administrative bodies. Sooner or later the matter must be taken up by some Government or another; and it cannot, I think, be otherwise than obvious to the House that that Government loses very great advantages in dealing with this important subject which gives away beforehand all that it has to give, reserving till some indefinite period the thorough handling of all the difficult and complicated questions of local administration.

Sir, I think I have now concluded all that it is necessary for me to say, both as to what is contained and what is not contained in Her Majesty's Gracious Speech. Before I sit down, however, perhaps the House will permit me to make one somewhat general observation on the legislative proposals of the Government. They appear to me to be, on the whole, proposals of a wise, a salutary, and a beneficent character. They are proposals eminently adapted to be considered by the Legislature of a prosperous and a contented country in a time of peace and quietness. But, Sir, is the list of measures presented to our notice in this Speech in any degree analogous to that which anyone would have anticipated who had formed his opinions on the state of the country from listening to the speeches delivered during the last few years in this House? Let us suppose, if we can, the case of an individual so unfortunate as to be debarred from access to any information save that which he derived from perusing the speeches of Conservative Members, and the articles in Conservative newspapers. Let such a person be told that the Conservative Party had been returned to Parliament with a great majority, and at the opening of the first Session in which the Conservative Government have had full time to prepare their measures—let him be asked to suggest what he thinks will be the policy announced in the Speech from the Throne. He would naturally turn in the first place for a moment to Ireland. He would say—

"I think that unfortunate country must by this time be in a dreadful condition. You have had the Church disestablished; religion and morals must have altogether disappeared; crime must be more frequent in that country than ever. You have robbed the landlords of a great portion of their property. You have encouraged the Irish people to believe that by a little more agitation they may easily get the remainder. What a state that country must be in! It must be by this time (he would say) in a state not only of 'veiled rebellion,' but of open rebellion. No doubt, the first measure which the Conservative Government will have to propose to the House will be to double the garrison of Ireland and at once proclaim martial law." Then, turning from the state of Ireland to the state of the Army, the same person would say—"The late Government insulted and plundered the officers, they must, therefore, be in a state not very far removed from open mutiny; and, as for the battalions of the Army, they must be entirely empty." Now, the first thing a Conservative Government would naturally be supposed to do, under those circumstances, would be to ask for large additional Estimates, to remedy the grievances of the officers, and to have recourse to a system of universal conscription. Turning from the Army to the Navy, he would assume that it was impossible that we could have more than two or three iron-clads in our fleet, and those of the most antiquated description. The first thing, it would occur to him, that a new Government would do under the circumstances would be to propose a large loan, in order to build additional ships. Looking at the Colonies, he would say—"Those people have been in office for five or six years, and they must have alienated the affections of everyone of your colonies; they must all be on the brink of separation, and no island in the Southern Seas can be so misgoverned that it would ever invite England to undertake the administration of its affairs." Finally, I think he would look at home, and he would say that in the midst of all this ruin and desolation, which was brought upon the country by the late Government, there was, however, one cheering prospect. He would say—"Whatever happens, whatever may be the state of mismanagement that is going on, there is now one consolation, and that is, that the farmers and rate-payers will get some relief." He would say—"Our friends have been talking for years about the relief of the rate-payers; no doubt, £5,000,000 or £6,000,000 could be devoted to the relief of the ratepayers, and if that must be obtained by the imposition of a 6d. income tax it cannot be helped; it is what our friends always said ought in justice to be done." Now, I submit to the House that I have been drawing a picture which is scarcely, if at all, exaggerated. The materials for it I have drawn simply from the declarations which have been made by hon. Gentlemen opposite in thousands of speeches, and in newspaper articles, both during the existence of the late Government and since their retirement from office. I now commend to the House the careful consideration of the difference between the wise and temperate policy actually presented by Her Majesty's Government for the consideration of this House, and that which, from the writings and speeches to which I have referred, we were not unnaturally led to expect.

MR. DISRAELI: I am sure that the practical way in which the noble Lord has dealt with the Address, which has been moved by my hon. Friend behind me, renders any apology unnecessary from him for undertaking to fill the post he now occupies. Hon. Gentlemen on his side of the House will, I feel confident, believe me when I tell them that we learnt from our respected opponents, with great satisfaction, that we were about to meet Parliament with a recognized authority in one who would undertake the chief business of their political connection. It has been the boast of the House of Commons for a long period that, even when political passion runs high and party warmth becomes somewhat intense, there should exist between those Members of both parties who take any considerable share in the conduct of their business, sentiments of courtesy and, when the public interest requires it, even of confidence, which tend very greatly to facilitate the business of the country to the public advantage. I trust that feeling will in our time never cease, and I can truly say, without making or intending to make any observation of a personal or invidious nature, for Gentlemen on this side of the House, that it is matter of satisfaction to us that the chief business of our opponents is to be conducted by one who, in the course of many years in this House, has obtained equally our respect and our regard.

Now, Sir, the noble Lord has been somewhat critical on those paragraphs in the Gracious Speech from the Throne which refer to foreign affairs, especially that which relates to recent occurrences in the Kingdom of Spain. I must, however, confess that I did not clearly collect the exact drift of the observations of the noble Lord on that subject. I understood that he complained in some manner of the conduct of the Government. He seemed to think we had been lacking in courtesy to Marshal Serrano, in having intimated that we were considering whether it was our duty to recognize the existing Government. That could hardly be the case, for so far as I am informed, Marshal Serrano has not been slow to recognize the Spanish Government himself. But then the noble Lord proceeded upon the assumption that the paragraph in the Royal Speech was drawn up with the object of obtaining from the House of Commons an indication as to the course which in its opinion, Her Majesty's Advisers should pursue in reference to the accession of King Alfonso to the Spanish Throne. Now, I can only say that that representation of the noble Lord, though I have no doubt it is sincere, is at the same time, entirely mistaken. We have no wish whatever to call upon the House of Commons to assist us in the advice we should give Her Majesty in a matter which is highly important. The language employed in the Speech simply expresses the exact situation with regard to the question now occupied by Her Majesty's Advisers. They are, in concert with other Powers, considering the question of formally recognizing the Monarchy in Spain, and we shall be prepared to announce our decision upon it, and to vindicate that decision when required. The House will see that if we are acting in concert with other Powers, we ought to be fully and clearly acquainted with the opinions of those Powers before we resolve on our course. The noble Lord then proceeded to the question of India, and I am sure he could find no fault with the accuracy of the paragraph which, in the Queen's Speech, is devoted to that subject. He seemed, however, to think that we had been somewhat scant in our acknowledgment of the great public services of Her Majesty's Viceroy, and of the manner in which he encountered that terrible calamity which at one time seemed almost to be inevitable in that part of Her dominions. But the noble Lord acknowledged that in the Speech from the Throne on the occasion of the Prorogation, when the subject was naturally touched upon, that the Government did full justice to the great exertions and the great virtues of Lord Northbrook, and I believe when the time arrives that that noble Lord may probably have occasion himself to address his countrymen on so important an event in his Viceroyalty, we shall have from him no indication that he has not been supported throughout those trying circumstances with all the possible energy and sympathy of those who at present advise the Crown.

Then the noble Lord proceeded to the financial paragraph of the Speech, and on that lavished considerable criticism. The objection which he took to it seems to me, however, to be somewhat strange. He finds fault with it, because it is not prospective, and thinks that in the Queen's Speech we ought to favour the House with that interesting statement which, in the course of a few weeks, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer will offer to your consideration. Now, I apprehend that hitherto it has never been the custom to insert a Budget in the Queen's Speech. What may be the future conduct of Governments in that respect when hon. Gentlemen opposite are in office I cannot say; but it will certainly require considerable investigation before we adopt that mode of introducing to the notice of the country the state of our finances. The noble Lord then went on to call our attention to what he appeared to regard as a very serious point. While on the whole, he seemed to approve the Royal Speech, and while he led us to hope that we should be perfectly unanimous in agreeing to the Address which has been moved with so much ability by my hon. Friend behind me, he said he wished to have some surety that the subjects mentioned in the Speech would ever be heard of again, to learn something more of the programme of measures which we propose to submit to the notice of the House during the course of the Session, and whether we shall adhere to that programme. The noble Lord has had considerable experience of Parliamentary life; he has been a Member of more than one Ministry, and a Member, I think, of a Ministry under whose auspices the business of the Session has differed considerably from the programme laid down. I cannot understand, therefore, why the noble Lord should say that the Government should take the earliest opportunity of stating what measures will be considered, seeing that circumstances may arise which may prove that there are higher duties to fulfil, and greater objects to attain, than short-sighted mortals—and I am afraid Ministers must be acknowledged to be short-sighted mortals—can foresee on the first day of the Parliamentary Session. I can give the noble Lord no security whatever that the business of this Session will at all realize the programme. At present, all I can say is, that with the assistance of the House, it is our intention to bring forward and carry the measures we have enumerated, but you may have revolutions—you may have great catastrophes—you may have ecclesiastical misconceptions—you may have a revival of those burning questions which were the pride of the Ministry of the noble Lord and his Colleagues. I cannot answer for what may be the consequences if such unhappy circumstances should occur; but, at present, this is our programme; and I trust that the business of the Session—when it is over—will offer, upon the whole, a fair fulfilment of the expectations which we have held out. "But," the noble Lord has said, "there were some measures introduced last year which you are to introduce again, and endeavour to carry; and there are some you have dropped, although you promised last year that they should be again brought forward." There is that favourite measure of the noble Lord and his Friends, the Endowed Schools Bill. The noble Lord has said, "Are you going to deal with the Endowed Schools?" Well, there is now a Commission, which the noble Lord may not be aware—he is not bound to be aware—is acting with considerable satisfaction to the country. The decisions and conduct of that Commission—compared with those of the former one — render it extremely desirable that we should take advantage of the experience of the Commission before we trouble the House again on the subject. There is another matter which the noble Lord says is very important, and which he calls upon us to deal with—although in its present position one could hardly suppose or anticipate that we should have noticed it in any other spirit than we have in the Speech—and that is the offences connected with trade. I think the subject is of great importance, but Her Majesty's Ministers are not aware of its importance for the first time. Last Session they would have been very glad if they could have dealt with that subject; but they believed the course they recommended the House to follow, and which the House unanimously agreed to—namely, to issue a Royal Commission, and to avail themselves of the information obtained by that Commission, was the right one to be followed under the circumstances. Until their Report is made we, of course, cannot move in the matter. We believe the Report will be made very shortly, and we shall not hesitate to introduce a measure founded on the recommendations of the Committee and our own opinions on the subject.

The noble Lord next turned to the question of local taxation, and, as I understood, made the great charge against us that our conduct had not been straightforward upon that subject. But I did not, I confess, gather from the noble Lord any proofs in establishment of the position he wished to substantiate. On the contrary, every statement he made tended in exactly the opposite direction. He said — “You have always pretended that you were in favour, as a party, of relieving a certain class in the country from the unjust burden of local taxation, and last year you took a million of money off their backs.” We did do that, and it proved, at any rate, that we were acting in harmony with our statements. “But though doing so,” said the noble Lord, “you despised our previous offer of £1,200,000” — showing the superior sympathy of the noble Lord and his Friends to the amount of £200,000. But I can only say that I, for one, disclaim the charge of the noble Lord, that I have treated with derision or refused that offer of

£1,200,000 to the victims of unjust taxation. That offer was never made. It was talked about on this bench when it was occupied by the noble Lord and his Friends, and there was a suggestion at the same time that they should rob the Queen's Exchequer in the shape of the house duty to the same amount. But no proposition of the kind was ever brought before Parliament. Ours is a practical proposition. The moment we had the opportunity, we appealed to the justice of the House of Commons. We carried the measure we brought forward, and those who were unjustly taxed in our local fiscal system have now for a year been benefited to a great extent, and feel from that circumstance a confidence in the sincerity of those who for so long a time and so fruitlessly advocated the cause of justice. “But,” said the noble Lord, “you never can deal with local taxation in this sort of way. What do you mean to do this year? Do you mean to propose again that a large sum should be voted out of the public money to those who pay this local taxation, or what is your scheme? Until you deal with local taxation in a proper manner, founded on local administration and local control, you are doing nothing.” Now, I must say that the statement of the noble Lord's, that there is nothing in Her Majesty's Speech which holds out the prospect of that system of local control for taxation which he so warmly urges is scarcely justified. At the proper time, no doubt, we shall state what we propose to do with regard to local taxation, but that time is certainly not the first day of the Session. But to come to the specific charge of the noble Lord—that we have no measure for local taxation, or rather local administration, in our programme—I would remind the noble Lord that there are four Bills mentioned in Her Majesty's Speech, which will shortly come before the House, all of which will indirectly touch upon that question. You will establish an improved system of administration more expeditiously, if you endeavour to overcome gradually the immense difficulties in the way, than if you brought forward some large, showy measure which, after it left the hands of the Committee, would be altered to such an extent that the devisers of it would hardly recognize in it any of its original features, and which the country would probably receive with reluctance and disappointment. These measures will lay the foundation for a system of local taxation. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has given Notice to-night of a Public Works Loan Bill, which is intimately connected with this question, and I think he will be able on Thursday to show to the House what are the practical views of the Government upon it.

I have now, Sir, touched in not unfriendly criticism upon most of the points—I believe all—which were mentioned by the noble Lord. I will not attempt to vie with him in the masterly picture which he drew of the contrast afforded between the measures brought forward by the Conservative Government and the speeches made, I know not where, and the articles written, which I never read, by what he calls the Conservative Party. There is a most ingenious, but at the same time most inconvenient course—which I have noticed among many hon. Gentlemen opposite—and to-night the noble Lord has assumed the habit as if he had been born to it—of seeking out the most violent speeches made by the most influential persons in the most obscure places, and the most absurd articles appearing in the dullest and most uninfluential newspapers, and saying these are the opinions of the great Conservative Party. The great Conservative Party has been legitimately, and, I believe, very fairly represented on the bench opposite, when we were enjoying that freedom which is the noble appanage now of those whom I see before me. The opinions of the Conservative Ministry are now expressed from this bench, and we are responsible for them and will not shrink from that responsibility. So I must protest against the grotesque reminiscences of the noble Lord. I trust from what I see that the Address in reply to the gracious Speech of Her Majesty will pass unanimously. I must say that that Address was introduced to our notice by a speech which the House will not easily forget. The manner in which my hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Stanhope) vindicated the colonial policy of England, and the masterly way in which he treated the whole question of sanitary reform showed that we have one among us who will take part, I have no doubt most usefully and most honourably, in the debates that are impending upon the great question of the health of the people. My hon. Friend the Seconder of the Address (Mr. Whitelaw), from his local experience of Glasgow gave us, not merely upon the subject of the habitations of the artisans, but on the condition of the noble river that was once the greatest ornament of his city, information which I am sure will prove highly advantageous. There was one point in the speech of the noble Lord on which, I am sure, we shall be unanimous—and that is in our sympathy with our Sovereign in the hour of trial which she has recently experienced. It was, as the noble Lord accurately stated, the intention of Her Majesty, even at a late period, to have had the satisfaction of opening her Parliament. It was a great sacrifice on Her part to give it up. But, at any rate, She may experience this consolation, that her Parliament sympathize with her in her sorrow, and now shares her own gratification that that sorrow has not disturbed her Royal hearth.

FACTORY SYSTEM (INDIA).

QUESTION.

MR. ANDERSON asked the Under Secretary of State for India, If he is aware that an extensive Factory system is growing up in India, without any Government supervision for the protection and health of the women and children employed; whether his attention has been drawn to statements that these women and children are systematically worked for sixteen hours a-day, and in many cases even including Sundays; and, whether the Indian Government will adopt some such Factory legislation as we have in this Country for the prevention of such evils, before they attain greater proportions?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: The Secretary of State for India is fully aware of the increase of the factory system, mainly confined to the Presidency of Bombay, and in a recent speech at Manchester he alluded at some length to this increase. Major Moore, the Inspector-in-Chief of the cotton department in Bombay, stated in his last Report that a large number of women and children were employed in the mills near Bombay, and that the hours of labour were long, not being at present limited by Government. He suggested that legislation would speedily be required. The Secretary of State, in a despatch dated the 30th of April, 1874, commended the subject to the best attention of the Government of Bombay. Recently the Secretary of State has received from an unofficial source strong representations of the evil result of the system alleged to be in force in Bombay, and the subject is now engaging his careful attention.

QUESTION.

CAPTAIN NOLAN asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether the Irish fishermen can obtain loans under "The Irish Reproductive Loan Fund Act" of last Session, pending the publication of bye-laws by the Commissioners of the Board of Public Works; and, when will such bye-laws be published, and for how long have such bye-laws been before the Irish Privy Council waiting their sanction?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: It is not the duty of the Board of Works to publish the bye-laws under the Irish Reproductive Loan Fund Act. It rests with the Inspectors of Irish Fisheries to issue notices on the subject, with forms of application for loans. It is expected that these will be issued early next week. The bye-laws in question were approved by the Irish Privy Council on the 13th of January. The delay was due to a bye-law having been proposed which the Law Officers did not think was authorized by the terms of the Act.

THE COLORADO BEETLE.—QUESTION.

MR. HERBERT asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether Her Majesty's Government have taken any steps to prevent the introduction of the Colorado beetle into Ireland by the importation of American seed potatoes, or otherwise; and, should no precautions have already been instituted, what are the intentions of Her Majesty's Government on this subject?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: The subject of the hon. Member's Question was brought under my notice some time back, and I thought it right first to ascertain what steps had been taken by Foreign Governments in the matter. I find that the only Governments which have taken any real action are those of Austria and Belgium. The former has assured the Government of Switzerland, which had warned the European maritime countries of the possible danger, that the importation of American potatoes would be prohibited; and the Belgian Government has introduced a Bill for a similar purpose, which has been agreed to by a Special Committee. I have also made inquiries as to the nature and extent of the evil to be apprehended. I think there is reason to suppose that the harm recently done to the American potato crop has been much exaggerated, and I am informed that the insect in question has been known in America for more than a century. It attacks the stalks and leaves of the potato plant, not the root, though that naturally becomes diseased in consequence. No potato stalks or leaves are imported from America, and as only healthy roots would be imported, it would seem hardly possible that the insect could be thus conveyed into this country. I am now in communication with the English Privy Council on the subject, because it is obvious that if any preventive measures are adopted, they ought to apply to the whole of Great Britain as well as to Ireland. But I must add that the importation of potatoes into the United Kingdom, especially in the event of a failure of the home crop, is very large, and therefore any interference with this trade would require the most careful consideration on the part of Her Majesty's Government.

THE ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

Report of Address brought up, and read.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER reminded the House that Her Majesty's Speech referred to certain measures of last Session which were dropped, and that amongst the measures so referred to was the Supreme Court of Judicature Act (1873) Amendment Bill. On that subject he wished to say a few words. He had no intention now to raise any discussion on that part of the Judicature Bill to which he specially alluded—namely, that which regarded the ultimate Appellate Jurisdiction of the House of Lords—a question of great importance, and one that caused a considerable amount of discussion last year. He also deprecated any opinion being given by Her Majesty's Government on a subject of so much importance on the present occasion. It was a question, indeed, of such great moment that it would only be properly and safely decided after the most mature consideration. He rose, therefore, only for the purpose of impressing on the Government the expediency of obtaining the opinion of the Judges on the question whether the Appellate Jurisdiction in the dernier ressort should or should not continue to be exercised by the House of Lords. He meant the opinion not of the English Judges only, but also of the Scotch and Irish Judges; and he hoped before the Government formed any definite decision on a matter, the importance of which, both constitutionally and legally, could scarcely be overrated, they would obtain the opinion of those learned persons on that question.

MR. BENTINCK said, that the sudden collapse of the debate on the Address on Friday made it impossible for any Member to offer any remarks at that time, and he was anxious therefore now to say a word or two which he would willingly have said on the previous occasion. After they had heard the very able speeches of the Mover and the Seconder of the Address, they had a speech from the noble Lord the Member for the Radnor Boroughs (the Marquess of Hartington) that fully justified the distinction which had been recently conferred upon him by his political Friends. But in the course of that speech the noble Lord did that which he (Mr. Bentinck) was now about to do himself—namely, to express regret at certain omissions in the gracious Speech from the Throne. He would do that, however, on very different grounds from those stated by the noble Lord. The noble Lord expressed his regret that in the Speech from the Throne—which they all understood to be an expression of the opinion of the Government—there was no allusion to “economy.” Now, he should have regretted any such allusion. Hon. Gentlemen opposite sometimes appeared to labour under the erroneous view that Members on the Conservative side of the House took great pleasure in imposing taxes on the country—forgetting that those Members had to pay taxes themselves. On the other hand, it should be remembered that economy was not always a wise and beneficent thing—that unwise economy only meant wasteful extravagance; and he regretted that the noble Marquess should have advocated economy without reference to the grounds upon which it should be practised. With respect to the omissions in the Queen's Speech, there certainly existed in this country, whether well-founded or not, a strong feeling of apprehension that the Navy was not in the condition it ought to be in. He might be told that that was not a question for debate on the Address, but a question for debate on the Estimates. With that view, however, he did not agree. This was a great and grave question, and whilst one which might ultimately affect the Estimates, it was also one that was fairly entitled to a place in the Speech from the Throne. Again, he might be told that in Her Majesty's gracious Speech we were assured that every hope was entertained of a time of peace throughout Europe; but then nobody could say that war was impossible. There was in the minds of the people of this country not long ago a strong feeling of apprehension that the position of our Navy was not what it ought to be, and the grounds of that apprehension had increased within the last few months. In the first place, what was the condition of our Army? The Army had, according to general opinion, become a mere nominis umbra, and it was feared that in a very short time the number of deserters would rival the number of recruits. If that were so, we were the more bound to look at the condition of our Navy. The increased armaments of foreign Powers rendered it necessary that we should have our own on a more satisfactory footing, not merely for the defence of the country—the defence of the soil—but for the protection of our commercial interests at sea in the event of complications arising by which we might be involved in hostilities. The First Lord of the Admiralty told us last year that he was determined we should not have merely a phantom fleet. The right hon. Gentleman had not the opportunity last year of bringing about the improvements that were desirable; but it was to be hoped, as we were entering on a new Session, that he was about to take measures which would place the Navy of this country in a position to enable us to defend our honour and protect our interests. There was another point of very great importance which must be regarded as an omission from the Queen's Speech. The people of this country had for years past been horrified by numerous and frightful railway accidents. It might be said that that was a matter of detail, and not a question that ought to be raised on the Speech from the Throne; but when we looked at the frightful character of the accidents which had occurred, and their number, it became a question which concerned every man throughout the length and breadth of the land. Seeing that those accidents might be in a great degree ascribed to the maladministration and rapacity of Railway Boards, the time had, he contended, arrived when it was the duty of the Government to interfere in the public interest. It had been shown by the clearest evidence that the great majority of the accidents on railways might be prevented by a resort to the commonest precautions, which Railway Boards for some cause or other seemed determined not to adopt. As to the financial question, he said it was a question of "blood and money." He knew how strong the railway interest was in that House, and he asserted this—that there was no man in that House who would assert that railway accidents could not be prevented by a careful system. He therefore hoped, inasmuch as the subject was one which concerned the community at large, that his right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade, with whose kindness of heart and energy they were all so well acquainted, would take the subject into his serious consideration. It was argued, indeed, on behalf of the railway companies, that further legislation would diminish rather than otherwise the responsibility of Railway Boards; but that was a proposition which he entirely denied, for the more severe and stringent the legislation the greater, he contended, would be the responsibility of those Boards. It was admitted on all hands that these numerous accidents might in most cases be prevented by Government interference and legislation; and, under these circumstances, if the Government were not prepared to deal with the subject, the responsibility must rest on the Government's shoulders. Accidents were occurring nearly every day, which could be prevented by legislation. He therefore asked his right hon. Friend in the interest of humanity to bring forward a Bill on the subject as soon as possible, and put an end to the present state of things.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER observed, that there was only one paragraph in the Royal Speech which referred to Ireland, and that said that—

Now, this was a very excellent paragraph as far as it went; but he thought it would have been more candid on the part of the Government if they had stated what was the fact—namely, that Ireland was in the enjoyment of profound peace, and that the Judges of Assize had for the last two years had very little work to do; so much so, indeed, that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, in a speech made at Dublin during the Recess, had openly said that the time had come to consider whether the number of Judges might not be reduced. Perhaps that confession on the part of the Ministers would have involved too direct a compliment to the Sister Isle; but the compliment would, nevertheless, have only been the truth, although it might have reflected too much on the remedial measures proposed for the country—not by the present, but by the past Government. So far as he was concerned, he should feel it his duty not to consent to the retention of a single link of the chain called the Peace Preservation (Ireland) Acts, as he thought from what occurred last Session that the National Representatives had a right to expect that the whole of that most unnecessary and oppressive code would be repealed. In the paragraph in Her Majesty's Speech following the one he had alluded to, it was mentioned that several measures which were postponed last Session would be again introduced. He would observe that five-sixths of the measures alluded to in the Speech at the commencement of last Session had been postponed, and what was the reason of that? Simply, that Parliament had such a quantity of legislation before it that it could not be disposed of even if hon. Members sat from the 1st of January to the 31st of December. Under those circumstances, he thought it would be for the advantage of the Government if they could get rid of some of that legislation; and they might begin to do that by relieving the House of Irish affairs, which were undoubtedly a great burden and cause of grievance to English and Scotch Members. He asked them, therefore, to give Irish Members freedom of thought and action in a Home Rule Parliament, where they might settle their affairs themselves. The hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. E. Stanhope), in moving the Address in reply to Her Majesty's Speech, alluded to the deterioration of the artisan class, caused by their miserable and inadequate dwellings; but what was the case in Ireland?

There you have a country suffering not from the deterioration, but from the extermination of its people. Between the years 1861 and 1871, no less than 1,626 houses disappeared from the face of the county which he had the honour to represent (Mayo), and within the same period 27,496 of the people emigrated to foreign lands. Why was that? It might be said, because there was no room and no land for them in Ireland. Such, however, was not the case, as there were 6,000,000 of acres of waste lands in the country, at least two-thirds of which might be cultivated. It might be asked, Why did not the Irish people cultivate this waste land? He would tell the House. It was because Ireland was one of the few unfortunate countries in which the land was not held by the people, but by an absentee oligarchy, who had obtained it by numerous confiscations, and who were ever ready to assert their rights, but slow to perform their duties. He had not spoken with the desire to introduce any inharmonious element to the somewhat formal proceedings connected with the reception of the Speech from the Throne. He had spoken simply in order that it might be understood at the outset that he — and he believed the Gentlemen with whom he had the honour to act — would not allow the business of Ireland to be neglected. If the Government would not allow them to discuss Irish affairs in a Home Rule Parliament in Dublin, they should hear of them constantly at Westminster.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON said, he wished to say a few words upon the subject of Local Taxation. There was great dissatisfaction with the small notice taken of this matter last year, and with the total omission of the subject from the Queen's Speech this year. The right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government said that this was a matter which would be properly dealt with when the Budget came on; but it was to be feared that the surplus would not be sufficient to give them very great hope of getting a grant in aid of local taxation. Besides, he was one of those who did not look much to grants in aid, because the amount of such grants went principally to the towns. A grant in aid was not the way to reach the root of the evil; but it was like skinning over the wound and leaving it rankling underneath. His right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in answer to a deputation that waited upon him last year, used these remarkable words. He said—

"The system of raising general taxation for general purposes from one particular kind of property inflicted as great a violation of justice as could well be conceived."

In his (Sir George Jenkinson's) opinion the total exemption of one class of property from local taxation was the main evil to be dealt with, and nothing but legislation to remedy that evil would give the relief desired. He trusted, therefore, that Her Majesty's Ministers would not lost the great opportunity now afforded them, and that they would introduce during this Session a measure which would effectually put an end to the present unsatisfactory state of things.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, he regretted that the question of University reform, which possessed considerable interest for a large class of persons inside that House and out of it, was conspicuous by its absence from the gracious Speech from the Throne. There was a wide-spread desire existing among men of all parties in the Universities both of Cambridge and Oxford that this question should be settled, and pending its settlement several important questions — among others the tenure of Fellowships and the contributions of the Colleges to the Universities — remained in abeyance. The members of the Universities of Cambridge and Oxford looked forward to the appointment of a Royal Commission as the arbitrator in this difficult question, and they hoped that the absence of all mention of the subject in the Royal Speech was not to be taken as proof that Her Majesty's Government considered the subject as unworthy of their attention, but that either a Royal or Parliamentary Commission would be appointed to investigate the subject. He believed the latter would be the better of the two. At a recent meeting held at Oxford, which was attended by a great many eminent members of that University, the general wish was for the appointment of a Commission; but should not that be in accordance with the views of Her Majesty's Government, it might be hoped they would state what they intended to do.

MR. SCOURFIELD said, he hoped that, in the promised measure for the prevention of the pollution of rivers, powers would be taken to prevent also obstructions, which the Board of Trade had hitherto admitted their inability to deal with satisfactorily. The obstruction of rivers was a growing evil in many parts of the Kingdom, and required to be prevented. If the only achievements of the present Session were to be the prevention of the pollution of rivers and the removal of the obstructions, those results would be sufficient to vindicate its right to public gratitude. The bill of fare contained in the Royal Speech was an ample one, and in some respects it was possibly too strong. On the subject of local taxation, he wished to see a more accurate definition of the question. The general taxes of the country were levied under Acts of Parliament, and the taxpayers could clearly understand what they had to pay; but the local rates, though nominally levied by local bodies, depended as to their amount upon the representations of official persons who had no sort of interest in the diminution of the burdens, but whose interest, in fact, lay in the opposite direction. Those who imposed the rates wished to indulge in a vicarious philanthropy. The wished, as the hon. and learned Member for the City of Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) said of them, to play the part of the Good Samaritan, without providing the oil and the twopence. Something might be done, perhaps, to remedy the evil by means of subventions; but, as a general rule, subventions were clogged with conditions which increased the expense, and could not, therefore, be resorted to with general advantage.

MR. JOHN MARTIN said, he believed that an understanding had been arrived at between the British Representatives—who formed an overwhelming majority in the House—that the Address in reply to Her Majesty's gracious Speech should be passed without an Amendment being put to the House. He could very well understand such an arrangement being made by those who wished to make things pleasant; but he must be permitted to say that the position of the Irish Nationalist Members—who formed the majority of the Irish representation in the House, and who were alone authorized to speak with the voice of Ireland—was a very peculiar one. There seemed to be a prevailing disposition in the House to ignore the peculiarity of the position occupied by the Irish National Party. It was expedient at the beginning of the Session that the position of that Party should be clearly defined. As a Member of the National Party, he wished to express what his view was of the position of himself and his Colleagues. They were sent there to be entitled to all the rights which were enjoyed by other hon. Members; but their special mandate and mission was to tell the House that the nation which they represented, and which had been deprived of its National Parliament 75 years ago, had never given its consent to that usurpation. They were sent there to make that known with all courtesy and kindness, but distinctly and unmistakably, to that House—to say that Ireland demanded back her National Parliament. The vast majority of the people of Ireland, as well as the majority of the Irish constituencies, had empowered the Irish Nationalist Members to demand the restoration to Ireland of her National Parliament, Ireland continuing under the British Crown and forming a member, as this country did, of the British Empire, and that new arrangements of a confederate character should be made which should be just and honourable to both parties, and which might tend to strengthen the ties and sympathies, and promote the common interests of the two countries.

COLONEL BERESFORD said, the statement in the Royal Speech that Her Majesty continued to receive from all foreign nations assurances of hearty good friendship must be satisfactory to them all. There could be no doubt as to the existence of those feelings; but all pleasant assurances notwithstanding, was there a Member of that House who had studied the map of Europe, who did not feel that there was every reason to fear that Europe was on the verge of a crisis in the last quarter of the 19th century we had so nearly reached—a crisis which when it happened would be more terrible in its aspects and consequences than that which marked the corresponding period of the last century—a crisis which would inevitably leave wide-spread calamity behind it, and probably produce changes of vital importance in the political relations of those kingdoms that would be involved in the struggle or be subject to its influences, nay, he might add, of a catastrophe more tremendous than had been seen since the overthrow of the Roman Empire. Foreign nations expressed and felt friendship towards us—some of them might presently need our assistance—but what were their feelings one towards another? Were not the seeds of irreconcilable quarrels now germinating? To descend from speculation to fact, they had heard of Count Valerian Skrayinski's Doctrine of Nationalities, and they had read of the Panslavic conspiracy, which, when the proper moment arrived, was to unite the whole of the Slavonian race in one great Empire under the guidance and rule of Russia, thereby giving her three parts of Hungary, two-fifths of Germany, and a large slice of the Turkish dominions. In addition to this pleasant prospect, were they not well aware of the dire hatred of France towards Germany, and that at this present time the bitterest of quarrels was still raging between the German rulers and the Sacerdotal Power, while everywhere the revolutionary forces were biding their time, waiting for the moment when they should rend into shreds the property of others. As the time was approaching when all these divers disputes would be referred to the arbitrament of the sword—for in his humble judgment there was no other way of settling them, and the modern European military system would furnish not only every State but every fraction of a State with soldiers—it seemed to him that we should not put too much trust in Princes nor in pleasant phrases, but ask ourselves what we intend to do in all this turmoil? Surely not to stand here all the day idle? And if we intended to prepare ourselves for the coming events, it was time that we began to consider how to set about it. And this brought him to another subject alluded to in the Speech. He meant the military condition of the Empire. From all he had read and gathered, nothing had been so unsatisfactory the last few years as the state of the military forces of this country. The childish ignorance displayed by Lord Cardwell when he introduced his three years' service system, which had only to be made public and recruiting in this metropolis was at once stamped out, followed by the hasty withdrawal of the measure, and the substitution of the six years' man, another grave mistake, in his humble opinion, showed how a statesman could play at making soldiers. He was thankful to know that, under different auspices, we were gradually arriving at a better condition of things for the Army. Meantime he was of opinion that there was only one point in military affairs on which a sincere patriot could dwell with satisfaction, and that was the upraising of the martial spirit of the country by the formation of the Volunteers, and the spread and knowledge of the use of arms amongst a large portion of the population by the long continuance of that force. This spirit must be encouraged, and this knowledge extended, despite the modest proposal—or he might say the monstrous proposal—of the hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for Sunderland (Sir Henry Havelock), who, with one stroke of his pen, would expunge that force from The Army List. In confirmation of his (Colonel Beresford's) view as to the expediency of improving our military condition, he would quote from a leading article in The Times of the 18th of January the following passage:—

"In the gloom that surrounds us one thing is perceptible. All men are arming themselves. It is the darkness that may be felt, and the sensation is not imaginary. At the word of command, Germany is arming en masse, and the surrounding nations—that is, the best part of the world—cannot but do as she does."

On the near approach of the powers of evil, military tyranny on the one hand, anarchy and spiritual usurpation on the other, if freedom, good government, and common-sense were to retain a local habitation and a name, it could only be when supported and sustained by the British race in every quarter of the globe. It therefore behoved us to draw still closer the ties which bind our Colonies to the mother country by giving them their full share of the powers, the honours, and the responsibilities of this great Empire, and he trusted that the day was not far distant when representatives of colonies would take their seats in that House. The tempest he had depicted might not come to-day or to-morrow, but many in that House would assuredly live to see it. But all was not evil; and if it were permissible to feel pleasure in the face of a storm, that pleasure might arise from the fact that the cant and self-seeking, the vanity and frivolity which had disfigured the last two quarters of this century would then be swept away, and common-sense be once more knocked into the brains of men by the unanswerable logic of external circumstances.

MR. HERBERT said, that as an Irish landlord he should be doing injustice to his countrymen if he did not rise to vindicate them from the attacks made upon them by a former speaker. He was no Home Ruler, and he had no feeling in favour of what was called Home Rule; because he thought that real Home Rule was to be found in the union between Ireland and England. He, as an Irishman, felt as deep an interest in the prosperity and welfare of his native country as did any Irish Member in that House. A great many speeches had been made in favour of Home Rule by a set of men who went about the country making a parade of their patriotism, and people's minds had been filled by them with statements with respect to tyranny and oppression on the part of Irish landlords which he (Mr. Herbert) would contradict as much as he could do in that House. They had but a few moments before heard it stated in that House that, while the Irish landlords were ready to enforce the rights of property, they were forgetful of its duties. He, as an Irish landlord, felt indignant when he heard such unfounded charges made against the Irish landlords. He could name hundreds of them who were ready to do anything in their power to ameliorate the condition of the Irish people, and who were as desirous of promoting their prosperity as any of those public agitators to whom he had alluded. With respect to the exceptional statutes alluded to in the Royal Speech, it was a well-known fact all over the country that the operation of those Acts had saved the lives of many of Her Majesty's subjects. They had produced both peace and tranquillity throughout the country. Still, no one would rejoice more than he would to see them repealed. But when they had had murders all over the country, and now found that those murders had ceased, the fact was in itself the best proof of the necessity which had existed for the exceptional legislation to which reference had been made in the Royal Speech.

MR. BONAYNE considered that the hon. Member (Mr. Herbert) when he spoke of murders being general throughout the country had vilified the county which the hon. Gentleman himself represented, for to his (Mr. Ronayne's) own knowledge there had not been agrarian murder in that county for the last 30 years. He believed the Kerry landlords knew how to take care of themselves, and he had heard from one of the largest agents that the land there let at about 20 to 25 per cent higher than land of the same agricultural value in other parts of Ireland. He had known the hon. Member to attend meetings of farmers' clubs when they discussed the very question to which he had himself alluded. The hon. Member was, he believed, a member of the Kerry Farmers' Club, and prior to the Kerry election he frequently attended meetings of that club. There was one part of Her Majesty's Speech to which he desired to refer—namely, its statement as to the general prosperity of Ireland. He presumed that the Government had had their information from the same source from which the Lord Lieutenant derived his in order to make the speech he recently delivered. Well, his Excellency and the Members of Her Majesty's Government were not shopkeepers in Ireland. They were not trades-people in that country. They did not derive their incomes from the dividends arising from Irish railways. If that were so, they would have known that the last three years had been years of pressure and not of prosperity. A Gentleman well known in Ireland, and a Member of that House, stated at a meeting of one of the principal Banks in the South of Ireland, of which he was the Chairman, recently held, that business had not been so bad for many years as it had been during the last three years. There had not been for many years so many civil bill processes, or so many judgments against farmers and shopkeepers in country towns, or a period when business had been so bad. There was only one index from which he presumed the statement as to the prosperity of the country had been drawn—namely, that there never had been such an attempt on the part of the landlords as there had been during the present year to raise the rents, especially in the county of Kerry.

MR. OLIVE, in reference to the assertion that rents had been raised 25 per cent in Kerry, and yet that no agrarian outrage had occurred there, observed that in that view high rents were indicative of peace and tranquillity. As a Mayo landlord, though not an Irish Member, he could not allow the statement made with regard to that county to pass unchallenged.

MR. RONAYNE wished to explain that the statement he had made, on the authority of the largest agents, was that the rents in the county he had mentioned were 20 to 25 per cent higher on land of the same agricultural value than in other parts of the country. Possibly, the rents in Mayo were higher still.

MR. CLIVE said, if that were so high rents did not tend to tranquillity, as there had been many murders and attempts to murder in that county within the last two or three years. A description of these he would reserve for the debate on the Motion to be brought forward with reference to the coercive measures for Ireland. He had been connected with Mayo for 25 years, before the hon. Member for the county (Mr. O'Connor Power) had even visited it, and during that period his time and money had been devoted to the civilization of the population, the improvement of their condition, and the cultivation of the land. The hon. Member spoke of 6,000,000 acres of uncultivated land. Of these about 40,000 belonged to him, and he had endeavoured to reclaim them as far as his means allowed. It cost from £15 to £20 an acre to do so, and it was merely fine declamation to say that waste land could be reclaimed by the people. It required capital, and time, and labour to reclaim land. He presumed that the hon. Gentleman included Lord Dufferin and other Irish landlords in his denunciation of the class, though he knew that that noble Lord and 20 other eminent landlords whom he could name had exerted themselves most praiseworthy for the improvement of the cultivation of the country. He should like to know what the hon. Gentleman had done himself. How many acres had he reclaimed? How many lives had he by his exertions saved? Why, during the famine he (Mr. Clive) had had 500 or 600 men and boys in his employment reclaiming the very land to which the hon. Gentleman had alluded as waste and uncultivated; and in those efforts he might fairly say that, at a time when if one walked out he would meet the wandering spectres of men and boys at the point of starvation, he had saved many lives. A great deal of land had been reclaimed, and cultivated by the landlords. The hon. Member had said Ireland was tranquil, and the Judges were idle. If the Judges were idle, it was because crime could not be detected. He would take an opportunity, when the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland brought in his promised Bill, of alluding to that subject; but he might in anticipation say that the tranquillity of Ireland was more due to the measures of the noble Lord the present Leader of the Liberal Party (the Marquess of Hartington) in that House, when he was at the Irish Office, than to the measures of his predecessors.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I should be very glad to have spared the House the few remarks I feel bound to make, and might have done so, if the hon. Members who have addressed the House had spoken on the first night of the Session instead of on the Report of the Address. The hon. Member for West Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck) complains of the debate on that evening having collapsed. Well, Sir, I am not answerable for the debate having collapsed. After the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition had concluded his speech, I declined for some time to rise, in order that hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House might have that opportunity; and if they had availed themselves of that opportunity, it would not have been necessary for me to make the observations I have now to trouble the House with. The hon. Member for West Norfolk complains of two omissions in Her Majesty's gracious Speech—one with respect to our armaments, and the other with respect to the present state of our railroads. The hon. Member for West Norfolk is impressed with the conviction that the state of the British Navy is at this moment very unsatisfactory, and he gives it as his opinion that Her Majesty's Government ought to have taken an opportunity in the Royal Speech of announcing remedial measures in that respect which would have been satisfactory to the country. Now, I may remark, in the first place, that that would have been a course unusual to adopt.

It is the duty of the Ministry of this country to assure themselves that the state of the defences of the country is satisfactory, and that the armaments at their command are ample and adequate to protect the commerce and settlements of Her Majesty, and in that case the House will wait until the proper opportunity is afforded to those who are responsible for the Government of the country to go into the details of the subject. The rules of our Assembly and of our procedure are framed with a view that the House should have an early opportunity of assuring themselves on those important matters; and I cannot at all agree with the hon. Member for West Norfolk that it was our duty, whatever steps we may take with regard to the supply the House may grant us to maintain the forces and armaments of the country, to make that announcement in Her Majesty's gracious Speech. The hon. Member is, however, convinced that the state of the Navy is in every way inadequate to the duties it has to perform, and to the requirements of the country; but I might remind the hon. Member that one ought not too easily to adopt those rumours which often get afloat in a free country like England. The hon. Gentleman may, I think, gather some intimation of the expediency of being guarded and temperate in remarks of the kind he has made at this period of the Session from the cursory allusion he made to the state of the Army. The hon. Member did not dwell at such length upon the unsatisfactory condition of the Army as he did on that of the Navy, but he spoke of its condition in terms not more measured; and I recollect he said that, so far as the British Army was concerned, he believed that at this moment the number of our recruits was equalled by the number of our deserters.

MR. BENTINCK: The right hon. Gentleman has mistaken what I said. What I said was, that, if we could believe what we heard, in course of time the number of deserters would vie with the number of our recruits.

MR. DISRAELI: Well, I do not think the explanation of the hon. Member materially differs from his original statement. I believe I am correct in saying that the number of recruits this year exceeds the number last year by 3,500, while the number of deserters this year is less than the number last year. The hon. Member and the House must therefore see that there was not the slightest foundation for even the revised statement he has made. Well, now we come to the next complaint of the hon. Member—namely, the omission in Her Majesty's Speech of any reference to railways, their condition, and the consequences of their management. The hon. Gentleman has assumed that we have made that omission because we regard the subject merely as a detail. I cannot in any way agree with the hon. Member in that view. I cannot conceive any subject of greater interest to the country, or one more grave in its character and consequences, than the condition of our railways and their management; and certainly I should have felt it my duty to advise the insertion of a paragraph in Her Majesty's gracious Speech alluding to the unsatisfactory condition of our railways if I had not remembered what the hon. Gentleman certainly did not seem to remember in the early part of his observations—that only last Session Her Majesty was advised to issue a Royal Commission formed of eminent and able men from both sides of the House—of men of science and of great experience—to investigate the whole subject of the management of our railways. It is also notorious that this Commission have pursued their investigations with great energy—I will not say with completeness, because they have not yet given us their Report—in various parts of the country. Any notice of the railway traffic of this country in the Queen's Speech, under such circumstances, would have been only a barren allusion. It must be clear to the House that we must await this Report, which, I believe, will be a voluminous and important Report, and no doubt afford materials for useful and beneficial legislation upon the subject. The remarks on the Report of the Address were varied by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power), who remarked upon the passage in Her Majesty's Speech referring to Ireland. It is a passage which, as far as the hon. Member and his friends are concerned, could scarcely be interpreted in a hostile sense. The hon. Gentleman, however, seemed to make it the occasion for commencing an invective against Her Majesty's Government and the House of Commons, and for assuring us that every possible obstacle will be raised against the satisfactory accomplishment of business here. The hon. Member for Mayo might, perhaps, have recollected—it would have been a graceful act on his part if he could have reminded the House at the time he made those observations—that there was a special proclamation last Session against the county he represents, and that during the Recess this special proclamation against the county of Mayo was withdrawn. The hon. Member, however, was too excited by his subject to remember this slight incident. He informed us that such was the state of repose and tranquillity in the county of Mayo and in Ireland generally, that the Judges in fact had nothing to do; while the hon. Gentleman who followed him later in the debate (Mr. Ronayne) assured us that there never were so many actions, and so many judgments, and such busy work apparently in every department of the legal and judicial establishments of Ireland as at the present moment. [Mr. RONAYNE: I referred entirely to civil business.] I shall be very glad if, when the time arrives of which we have been warned, this singular contrast as to the state of Ireland, presented by equal authorities, can be felicitously explained. My hon. Friend the Member for North Wilts (Sir George Jenkinson) has introduced what he seems to think a novelty into the debate—namely, the subject of Local Taxation; and he says he very much regrets that, both in the Queen's Speech and in the debate which took place on Friday night upon it, no notice was taken of the question of Local Taxation. Now, I, on the other hand, thought that the most considerable portion of the evening on Friday was spent upon that grateful question. [Sir GEORGE JENKINSON: I did not mean that.] My impression as to my hon. Friend's allusion may be erroneous, but it is shared by others near me. The point, however, is not of much importance. I can only say that every remark which my hon. Friend has made to-night on the subject of Local Taxation was, I think, fairly met in the debate the other night. We have never stated that we shall bring forward a large measure on Local Taxation. We told the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition, who touched upon the subject, that there were many Bills coming forward which indirectly dealt with that weighty question. Wereplied to him, and to those who said we had done nothing to redeem our pledge, that in the first year of the existence of this Government a considerable relief was given; and with regard to future measures we called upon the House to help us at the proper time to take those further steps which, in our opinion, the subject may demand. I must say that my hon. Friend the Member for North Wilts does not appear to me to have touched on any point respecting Local Taxation which was not anticipated on Friday. A noble Lord opposite (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) has alluded to University Reform, and seems surprised that that question was not introduced into Her Majesty's Speech. Now, in the language of the Speech itself, the House is called upon to consider not merely the measures there mentioned, but other measures which will probably be brought before Parliament during the Session. It is a rule which of late years has been greatly favoured in this House—namely, that the Queen's Speech should not be overloaded, and that the Government is not bound merely to the measures of which notice is given in the Queen's Speech. A certain discretion must be allowed. It was only on Friday night that the Lord Chancellor, in the other House of Parliament, gave Notice of an important measure of the Government for the amendment of the law with respect to patents; and in the course of the Session other measures may be brought forward, not noticed in the Queen's Speech. As to the question of University Reform, I might remind the noble Lord opposite that it was only at the end of the last Session, if I recollect aright, that the Report, which was the result of the protracted labours of a Commission, was delivered for our consideration. The noble Lord must remember that at that time the Colleges were not assembled; they have assembled, and the opportunity of forming and obtaining an opinion has no doubt prevailed since then; but the noble Lord must feel that there has scarcely been time for any Government to come to a mature conclusion upon a matter which is of a complicated nature. I can, however, assure the noble Lord that it is our opinion that no existing Government for a moment could maintain that the consideration of University Reform, and consequently legislation of some kind, would not form part of its duty. I believe I have now touched upon most of the points alluded to, except, perhaps, on that mentioned by my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Southwark (Colonel Beresford); though I am bound to say that I cannot follow him upon the important theme he has treated, for I fear that my observations might lead to misapprehension, and, perhaps, afford a spark which would be the origin of the conflagration he dreads. As to the passage in the Queen's Speech referring to our relations with our allies, I think it is expressed in justifiable, temperate, and true language. The circumstances of the case justify the expressions we have used; and, not wishing to look too far ahead, having to meet an Assembly not like some popular Assemblies, suddenly called together, and then, perhaps, for years not exercising their rights, but the great Council of the nation annually assembled, to which we have to explain, upon our responsibility, what we believe to be the accurate state of our relations with Foreign nations and Governments, I can only say we believe that peace will be preserved; and certainly it will be the effort of Her Majesty's Ministers to contribute, as much as possible to that result.

Resolved, That this House will, upon Wednesday next, resolve itself into a Committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to Her Majesty.

ARTIZANS DWELLINGS BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill for facilitating the improvement of the Dwellings of the Working Classes in large towns, said: In the course of the last Session of Parliament I think the Government, at all events, gave an earnest of their interest in the question relating to the dwellings of the working classes in this country—first of all by interfering with the action of one of the great railway companies in the metropolis; and, secondly, by presenting to this House a Standing Order, which was afterwards adopted, for the purpose of taking precautions in the case of other Bills of a similar kind from time to time brought before us. This is a matter which, as far as I am individually concerned, has engaged much of my attention. But the attention of the Government was formally called to it early in the Spring of last year by two memorials presented to the Prime Minister as well as to myself by two classes of persons, both deserving great attention. One of those memorials was from the Council of the Charity Organization Society, who have given a great deal of attention to the state of the dwellings of the poor. They issued a very able Report, which has been presented to the Government, and which certainly deserves their attention. They state—

“That the dwellings of the poorer classes in various parts of the metropolis are in such a condition, from age, defects of construction, and misuse, as to be deeply injurious to the physical and moral welfare of the inhabitants, and to the well-being of the community at large.”

The other body which addressed the Government was one of great eminence, which seldom interferes with public business or presents Petitions of this kind—I mean the Royal College of Physicians. So deeply did this eminent body feel that the condition of the dwellings of the poor in the metropolis deserved the special attention and interference of the Government, that they stepped out of their way last year to present this memorial to the Prime Minister, which I hold in my hand. They said—

“That it is well known to your memorialists that over-crowding, especially in unwholesome and ill-constructed habitations, originates disease, leads to drunkenness and immorality, and is likely to produce discontent among the poorer portion of the population.”

So that when the subject was brought before the notice of the House of Commons last year by the hon. Member for Hastings (Mr. Kay-Shuttleworth), in a very elaborate and, he will allow me to add, a very able speech, and when he was well seconded by the hon. Baronet near him (Sir Sydney Waterlow), I was able, on the part of the Government, to give an assurance that this matter had received their attention, and should continue to do so; and the pledge I then gave I shall now endeavour to redeem by asking leave to introduce a Bill on the subject. We may take it as an axiom that what the homes of the people are the people themselves will be found to be. That is a maxim upon which the House in a great deal of its legislation has acted. Much has been done on this subject, not simply by legislation, but by individual effort. In legislation we have endeavoured to pass Acts preventing overcrowding in dwelling-houses—Acts which we have not been able to carry out for reasons to which I will hereafter advert. We have passed Acts enabling Corporations to give up their land and borrow money in order to erect dwelling-houses for the working classes. We have also passed an Act, introduced by the hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. W. M. Torrens), although, I am afraid, somewhat shorn of its proportions, enabling the local authorities to pull down such houses as are absolutely unfit for human habitation. Much has also been done by the action of individuals, by trustees, and by public bodies. I need hardly mention the capital of £600,000 belonging to the Peabody Trustees, or the two societies—one presided over by the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Sydney Waterlow) and the other by Lord Claud Hamilton, who is no longer a Member of this House. Each of these associations has, I believe, expended a capital of £300,000 for these objects. Other bodies of a similar kind have done much for improving the dwellings of the labouring classes of this metropolis, but much still remains to be done. All the houses that have been constructed by those individuals and associations only provide accommodation for about 30,000 of the population; and when we remember that the growth of London has advanced during the last 10 years at the rate of 40,000 each year, it is clear that much more must be done if we wish to reach the root of the evil to be remedied. So far as legislation goes, the evil is pointed out by one of the memorials before me—that of the Charity Organization Society—

it the duty of some public body, possessing a wider sphere of action and in a more independent position than the local Boards and Vestries, and invested when necessary with powers of compulsory purchase, to initiate comprehensive improvements in the interest of the poorer classes, as has been done with good effect in Glasgow and Edinburgh and other cities, and, in a somewhat different form, in Liverpool."

I take it as a starting-point that it is not the duty of the Government to provide any class of citizens with any of the necessities of life, and among the necessities of life we must include that which is one of the chief necessities—good and habitable dwellings. That is not the duty of the State, because if it did so, it would inevitably tend to make that class depend, not on themselves, but upon what was done for them elsewhere, and it would not be possible to teach a worse lesson than this—that "If you do not take care of yourselves, the State will take care of you." Nor is it wise to encourage large bodies to provide the working classes with habitations at greatly lower rents than the market value paid elsewhere. Admitting these two principles of action, there is another point of view from which we may look, and another ground upon which we may proceed. No one will doubt the propriety and right of the State to interfere in matters relating to sanitary laws. Looking at this question as a matter of sanitary reform, there is much to be done by the Legislature, not to enable the working classes to have houses provided for them, but to take them out of that miserable condition in which they now find themselves—namely, that, even if they want to have decent homes, they cannot get them. The evil we have to grapple with is not one of modern growth, but arises from the neglect of past and former years. I would ask the political economist who may be disposed to scan this kind of legislation too closely, to remember that there is a maxim which is as true of nations as of individuals—that health is actually wealth. He must take into account the great waste of life even among those who reach manhood, the great waste of physical condition after infancy is passed, and the waste of stamina in the present generation and the future generation that will spring from it. He might also take into account the waste in lunatic asylums and gaols, and particularly the waste of sickness and death in all these

wretched places. I am not going to enter upon any elaborate statement as to the question of death-rate, but will take it on an average of years. I know it makes a great difference whether you are speaking of a small area or a large one, and whether, if you take a smaller area, there is a hospital or a workhouse in it. You have, therefore, to make a great many allowances and corrections before coming to the truth. I want, however, to put before the House a few plain, broad facts. If you consider that the death-rate is about $22\frac{1}{2}$ per 1,000 throughout the whole country—that in London it is $24\frac{1}{2}$ per 1,000, and that in Manchester it has been 30, in Liverpool during the last 10 years it has been 38, in Lancaster 30, and in Sunderland 37 per 1,000—there must be something wrong in these towns which makes the death-rate so different. Then, again, see the marked difference between one part of a town and another. In Liverpool, where the death-rate is 38 in 1,000, some parts of the town are just as healthy as some parts of London, and if you inquire into local areas, you will find that in certain courts the death-rate is very greatly in excess of other parts of the town, and swells the total average. For instance, in one district in London, having a population of from 2,000 to 2,100, there have been more people sick in five years than the whole population—not of ordinary diseases, but fevers, and that there is not one house in which there has not been a death annually. These are startling facts, and when you find that in Manchester, in some of the small enumerated districts, the death-rate was in one district 67 per 1,000, and that in another district—now happily swept away—the death-rate amounted to 70 per 1,000, it must be admitted that there is a great deal of preventable disease; and if by our legislation, and without any inroad upon the sound principles of political economy, we can prevent such a waste of life, power, energy, health, and everything that makes a nation healthy and wealthy, it is our duty to interfere and see whether we cannot do something to arrest this waste. If we inquire what is the death-rate among small and young children in particular parts of these towns, we shall arrive at the most terrible results. I have a Report of the Medical Officer of Health for Manchester, which shows that in one particular district, out of 100 deaths of persons of all ages, the deaths of children under five years reached the extraordinary rate of 49·7. In Liverpool, matters are still worse. The Friendly Societies Commission went very deeply into the question of the death-rate of children; and they found that, while the annual rate of mortality of children under one year on the average of all England amounts to 18 to 100 persons living, in Liverpool it amounted to 30; and between the age of one and two, while the average for England is 6·9, in Liverpool it is $18\frac{1}{2}$. Similar results are arrived at if we compare the number of children of the working classes who grow up to be strong and healthy adults with the number of children of the higher classes who do so. The Medical Officer of Health for Paddington has prepared tables, in which a comparison is instituted between such districts as Gloucester Square, Hyde Park, and Westbourne Terrace, and equal areas occupied by the working classes; and the result is that the less-crowded district, with one-sixth of the population of the other district, produces twice the number of children who grow up to be healthy adults. We have to consider what a waste of human life this is, and ask ourselves whether we can give the children of the working classes an equal chance of growing up to healthy manhood and womanhood. The causes of the present loss of life are not far to seek. Some of the Acts for the prevention of overcrowding are under my own superintendence, and when I came into office orders were given that they were to be carried out as far as possible; but medical officers, the police, and the sanitary authorities said that the difficulty in the way of enforcing the Acts was that to apply them would be to turn the people out of their houses into the streets, without there being any place to which they could go. Then it is not simply that houses are overcrowded, but districts are overcrowded, and the air is vitiated. I know of one place in St. Giles where there are 70 courts and alleys or small streets close together, without one single thoroughfare through which the residents can get a breath of pure air. The only way in which you can get into these districts is to cut a thoroughfare right through them. Some of the houses are actually in such a condition that the walls are engrained with disease, no expenditure of money upon them can make them healthy, and the only practical way of dealing with them is to pull them down. Family after family goes into a house, and it is certain to catch the fever which has killed off the previous occupants; and unless you step in and interfere this will go on for ages. In many cases you find that houses are built upon ground that is saturated with everything that is abominable, miasma rises from the ground through the houses, and nothing can be done to cure this unless you make a clean sweep of the houses. I have thought it right to go to Liverpool, Glasgow, and Edinburgh, to see what has been done in those places. The Liverpool Act was passed in 1864, the Glasgow Act in 1866, and the Edinburgh Act about the same time. From the experience of these towns we may learn some lessons as to what we ought to avoid. I have endeavoured to find out what has been the actual working of this Act in each of those places, and I have collected certain information which I have laid on the Table of the House. I went not only to those who had proposed the schemes, and who might take a favourable view of what had been done, but to those who had taken opposite views; I was met with kindness by all the authorities, by the Medical Officers of Health, and by the police; and they have furnished the statements which I have laid on the Table to guide us in the formation of our opinions. In Liverpool five presentments have been made by grand juries as to the bad condition of certain houses; and the Corporation, finding they had to deal with crowded courts, pulled down three or four rows of cottages, demolished 503 houses, and improved 392 courts, at a cost of £86,000 or £87,600. The main defects of the Liverpool Act are, that all the claims for compensation payable under one presentment cannot be settled by one tribunal, and that the working of the Land Clauses Acts involves delay and expense; and it is said that if the defects of the law were remedied the processes could be expedited with equal satisfaction to the owners without the Corporation paying twice the value of the property, once to the owners and again to the lawyers. Edinburgh has gone rather more vigorously to work, it has spent a large sum, and cleaned out some 1,400 houses; but it has acted upon a different principle, and in opening up thoroughfares, it has acquired some of the land improved in value by the operation, and has re-sold it, thereby reaping a considerable return, and considerably reducing the cost of the improvement to the ratepayers. But the Medical Officer of Health of Edinburgh says that it will require some years of experience to arrive at the practical results, and the lesson to be drawn from his warning is, that in anything we do we must not hope too hastily for the evidence of results. But from Edinburgh we learnt this—The Medical Officer, in one of his Reports, said—

“I can confidently assert that the poor have been put to no inconvenience by the pulling down of the old houses, for before they were forced to remove, careful inquiry was made as to the house accommodation for the class in question, and the Sheriff was satisfied in every case that there were houses to which they could betake themselves.”

This is a point that must be carefully guarded in future legislation. Many nests of crime have been broken down in Edinburgh, and the police report a falling off in the number of serious offences from 670 to 570 in the year. The brothels were reduced from 242 in 1859, to 125; and so with other matters dependent upon the character of the neighbourhood. The City of Glasgow has gone into the matter upon a much larger scale. They have incurred an expenditure which will ultimately amount to £1,750,000. While proceeding in much the same way as Edinburgh, the people of Glasgow have been wiser in their generation. They have not taken merely the bad houses. They found that their demolition greatly improved the property immediately adjoining, and thought they might just as well get the advantage as the owners of the property. In their scheme they bought, not only the bad houses, but the property in the neighbourhood. They will expend altogether about £2,000,000, and they hope to do it at a cost to the ratepayers of £300,000; and if you take into account the charges for hospitals, lunatic asylums, and gaols, I think you will find that this £300,000 is very much on the right side of the account. Of course, it would be necessary after houses have been built, that precautions should be taken that they do not soon fall into the same state as those which had been pulled down. In all cases of this kind you must take care to look after the property for the future; you must take sanitary precautions that the property shall not fall into a bad condition. In Glasgow I asked where the people expelled were driven to. Special inquiries were made whether they went to other over-crowded places to over-crowd them still more, what kind of houses they went to, and whether the houses were built at rates which enabled them to pay the rents. In one case 351 houses were demolished; but, although 351 families were compelled by these operations to remove, attention was confined to 263, the remaining 88 being accounted for in various ways. In regard to 20 of the 263 they were also otherwise accounted for. But, having excluded these, the remaining 243 were, on the whole, fair examples of the utterly insanitary house and their inhabitants, of the miserable population who contribute to the high mortality and furnish the most difficult problems in the improvement of the city. The exact number of persons living in these houses was 990, and they were compelled to seek houses elsewhere. Before the operations, of the 243 families whose history had been traced, 118 lived in houses of one apartment, 96 in houses of two apartments, 23 in houses of three apartments, and six in houses of four apartments. After the operations those 243 families were housed as follows:—96 in houses of one apartment, 116 in houses of two apartments, 16 in houses of three apartments, and three in houses of four apartments; five went to the suburbs, two to the country, three to lodgings, and two to Ireland. The same facts might be stated in another way—Of 118 families living in houses of one apartment when expelled by the Improvement Trustees, 76 removed to houses of the same size, 39 to larger houses, two to lodgings, and one to the country in Scotland; of 96 families living in houses of two apartments, 66 removed to houses of the same size, 10 to larger houses, 17 to smaller houses, one to the country, and two to Ireland; of 23 families living in houses of three apartments, four removed to houses of the same size, 18 to smaller houses, and one to lodgings; of six families living in houses of four apartments, all removed to smaller houses. Then, as to the rent of the new houses, it might be stated that the increase amounted to 20 per cent on the rental of a house of one apartment, to 20 per cent on a house of two apartments, to 58 per cent on a house of three apartments, and to 28 per cent on a house of four apartments. Then, as to the number of inmates per apartment, it was found that in the old houses 990 individuals were accommodated in 403 apartments, giving an average of 2·4 inmates for each apartment; and that in the new houses 949 individuals were accommodated in 388 apartments, giving still the same average of 2·4 for each apartment. But it was quite certain that the same number of inmates per house or apartment in the old and new houses really meant an increased cubic space in the new houses. This was especially true of the houses of three and four apartments. In the old houses these apartments were merely nominal, in the new they were real. Let me call your attention in this case, as in the case of Edinburgh, to the falling off of crime and the lessening of the number of brothels in the city—namely, a decrease of from 204 to 20, and this in the space of three years, from 1870 to 1873. Having stated what has been done in these three towns, I should like now to lay before the House the provisions contained in the Bill which I am now asking leave to introduce. I will do so very shortly. In the first place, we think this Bill—at present at all events—should be confined to the City of London, to the metropolis, and to large towns. No doubt there are places in the country which are very bad; no doubt there are places in small towns which are very bad; but the evil in those cases may be much more easily remedied than in large towns. Again, to apply the Bill to small towns would produce too much pressure on the ratepayers. At all events, we think it best, as I have said, for the present to confine the measure to large towns. Then, who are to have the duty of carrying it out? Clearly not private individuals. We think that the body in London should be that which is shadowed forth in the memorial of the Charity Organization Society. There cannot be a better body for the City of London, and the Metropolitan Board of Works should be the authority for the rest of the me-

metropolis; and in other large towns the town councils, which are practically the sanitary authority. Who, then, shall put the Act in motion? We proceed entirely on sanitary grounds. We do not wish them to make great street improvements for their own glorification. It is only sanitary purposes that we have in view—therefore we think the Act should be put in motion by the medical officer of health, who, by his own view, or called upon by a certain number of ratepayers, would be bound to report and certify whether in his opinion the place was an unhealthy district—whether disease prevailed there, and whether that was attributable to the badness of the houses. If he found it so, he would have to state that, in his opinion, it was an unhealthy district, and that an improvement scheme ought to be framed for it. That report would be forwarded to the local authority—being in London the Corporation, in the rest of the metropolis the Metropolitan Board of Works, and in large towns the town council. The local authorities would then take the matter into their consideration, and if satisfied of the truth of the report, and the practicability of applying a remedy and of the sufficiency of their resources—because we do not call on the town councils to ruin themselves—they would pass a resolution that the district was an unhealthy area, for which an improvement scheme ought to be provided. The improvement scheme would be accompanied by maps, particulars, and estimates, defining the lands it was proposed to take with compulsory powers, and providing for as many of the working classes as might be displaced in that area, either within the limits of the area or the vicinity thereof. In London that is a very essential matter. You cannot pull down a street in St. Giles's and send the people over to Battersea. If you displace the working class, you must lodge them in the vicinity of the locality, otherwise you make them paupers and deprive them of the means of subsistence. In Glasgow that difficulty was easily met. Happily, even in the most crowded sites of London the actual density of the population per acre is not very great; in some places it may be 300 or more; but although only 300 per acre, they may be living in the worst sanitary condition and dying almost daily. On the other hand, I could mention a space built on by the society over which the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Sydney Waterlow) presides, where the death rate has never yet exceeded 15 per 1,000, and where no less than 1,600 are housed per acre with perfect safety. As I have intimated, you are to provide that the people turned out shall be accommodated in the district, or be provided for in the immediate vicinity of it. I do not suppose that any hon. Member will think that town councils should have the power of taking other people's property without compensation; but here comes a question to which I would seriously invite attention. Every farthing spent in law expenses will undoubtedly raise materially the cost of the room which is eventually to be occupied by the poor workmen. The difference of 1s. a-week in the rent may easily be made; therefore, you must take care that no unnecessary cost in law expenses shall be incurred. The action of town councils in bringing Bills in this House is of a very curtailed character. They must have the consent of their ratepayers. We propose that, except as to certain consent on the part of the Government, the present restriction should be swept away. Nor do we wish to put them to the great expense of going themselves for a Private Bill. We wish to relieve them entirely of that expense; and, therefore, when it has been determined that an area is unhealthy and that there shall be an improvement scheme in the metropolis, it shall be referred to the Secretary of State for sanction. The Secretary of State will make inquiry, and if he be satisfied with the scheme, he will take upon himself the responsibility of passing the Provisional Order through this House, and so save enormous expensiveness to the parties themselves. With respect to boroughs, the Secretary of State has no local officer that he can employ, and we propose that they shall be relieved of Parliamentary expenses, and that the Local Government Board shall pass an improvement scheme. When that is done we have not the smallest intention of interfering with the execution of the scheme. The intervention of the Government is simply to give Parliamentary power and save expense. Everything else is left to local government. The next question is—"How can the value of the lands thus compulsorily taken be best arrived at?" I have already alluded to the circumstance that the working of schemes under the English Lands Clauses Act was found to be very expensive in Ireland, owing to the sub-divisions of tenures, to which it had to be applied. Therefore, 10 years ago an Act was passed, known as the Irish Lands Transfer Act, which provides a much simpler mode of ascertaining the value of land. Of course the English Act is incorporated in the present measure for all purposes except one, the provisions respecting valuation being adopted from the Irish Act. Accordingly, an arbitrator will be appointed who will go down to the locality and inquire into all the circumstances. If, however, the owner of any property proposed to be compulsorily taken wishes to appeal to a jury against the decision of the arbitrator, he will have the same right of doing so as he would have possessed under the English Act. The only question then for us to consider is what shall be the basis of the valuation on which the arbitrator shall act. The House will doubtless remember that under the English Lands Clauses Act there were no words specifying what the valuation should be. However, a custom has grown up in England to value the property at its proper value; but when a railway company wants it, 10 or 20 per cent is usually added as a sort of bonus to the owner. Now, we think such a bonus should not be given in regard to property of this kind. We think that a man ought to receive the fair market value of his land, and that of course the goodwill ought to be taken into consideration. Well, when the property has been obtained, the next question is, what is to be done with it? We have arrived at the opinion expressed in the Bill, that the corporations themselves should not be the builders of the houses; that they ought not to be building speculators. We believe there is a vast amount of floating capital which people would be willing to apply to this purpose, but which they do not so employ at the present moment, simply because they cannot get the land. We think that when the corporations have procured the land by these compulsory powers the time will have arrived when such available capital will be made use of; and, therefore, we give most ample power to the local authority to let or sell the property, on the express condition that there shall be accommodation for the labouring classes. Of course, it is possible that the land might be left waste, if no power of building were conferred on the local authority, and for this reason we reserve to the local authority the power to build in special cases, with the consent of the Secretary of State, or of the President of the Local Government Board. Such is the sum and substance of the Bill. Powers are given for borrowing and lending to the local authority by the Public Works Commissioners at a certain rate of interest. One thing we are bound to insist upon is that the monies employed in carrying out these schemes shall not be mixed up with the general borough rate, but that there shall be a separate account kept of all monies expended under the provisions of the Act. This is, in fact, a sanitary matter, and the accounts, as in other sanitary matters, ought to be kept quite distinct from all other rates and payments. Under the provisions of this Bill, a great deal may be effected; but I should be wrong if I did not once more caution the House not to imagine we are doing a magnificent and a showy work. It is a measure that will do the work silently, but surely. Those who desire to see the results of the Bill must go and look for them, and in a few years they will perceive them. Again, I must remark that we do not anticipate any sudden effect. The evil we desire to root out has been the work of generations; and though I believe the rate-payers will be more than fully recouped in the long run, yet for a time, at least, the measure must be worked at some expense. Nevertheless, considering the state of the people at the present time, considering how little has been done for them, and considering also the absolute necessity of raising this almost degraded class, who have been brought up in sickness, and who will perpetuate disease, if we do not afford them the means of improving their conditions, I ask you on these dens of wretchedness and misery to cast one ray of hope and happiness; I ask you on these haunts of sickness and of death to breathe, at all events, one breath of health and life; and on these courts and alleys where all is dark with a darkness which not only may be, but is felt—a darkness of mind, body, and soul—I ask you to assist in

MR. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH asked when the Bill would be in the hands of hon. Members, and expressed a hope that it would be delivered to-morrow. He also asked when it was proposed to take the second reading, and considered that as many large towns would be affected it would be well to allow some time to elapse before proceeding with that stage of the Bill. The whole measure seemed to hinge on the action of the medical officers of vestries, and he must therefore express a hope that they would be placed in a position of greater independence than they at present occupied, especially in London, where they were at the mercy of vestries composed to a great extent of the owners of small properties which were too frequently in a bad condition. With respect to the action of the local authorities, the right hon. Gentleman had not informed the House what restrictions they would have the power to impose on those who might wish to build upon the sites that were provided. It was evident, however, from an incidental remark, that the right hon. Gentleman saw the necessity of taking precautions against the same evils arising which now called for legislation. He could not conclude these few remarks without saying that the whole credit of the movement belonged to certain people who had been working for a very long time in this direction. In particular he might refer to the Metropolitan Association, over which Lord Claud Hamilton presided; to Lord Shaftesbury and to the associations with which he had been connected; to the Act passed by the hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. W. M. Torrens), and under which Act much more good would have been done but for the alterations made in it by the House of Lords; and more especially to the Committee appointed by the Charity Organization Society, which with the Royal College of Physicians had paved the way for the present measure. He must congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on the prompt manner in which he had acted upon the representations which had been made to him, and he hoped that the Bill would result in a great improvement in the condition of the working people.

SIR SYDNEY WATERLOW said, that having devoted many years of his life to this subject, and having been for some time Chairman of a Company which had erected many improved workmen's dwellings, he begged to offer a few words of congratulation to the Home Secretary for the manner in which he had dealt with the whole question. The way in which he had referred to the evidence in the Reports as to Edinburgh and Glasgow showed that he had been most anxious to grapple with the whole of the difficulties involved in an important and complicated question. The right hon. Gentleman had referred to the death-rate and the difficulty of making accurate calculations in reference to it; but he did not mention the fact that the houses built for the industrial classes by the societies were mainly occupied by families in which there were a large number of children, so that the death-rate in the other houses were much higher than would appear even from the figures given by the right hon. Gentleman. He feared that if the initiation was to depend upon the medical officers there must be some external power to stimulate them to action. He knew that in many large vestries and local bodies the members were frequently owners of small property, and that they would exercise their power over the medical officers to prevent proceedings which would affect their own pockets.

MR. WADDY said, that among all the measures shadowed forth in Her Majesty's Speech there was not one of more importance than that now brought forward, and he would venture to add his congratulations to those which had been already offered to the right hon. Gentleman for the earnest and felicitous manner in which he had brought the subject before the House. But, assuming that the Bill was to apply to the whole country, he feared there would be very serious difficulty in carrying out its provisions to any great extent, in consequence of the great power of origination and management given to the local authorities. In the first place, much expense would have to be incurred, and local authorities did not like to give it to their constituents to say that they had thrown heavy burdens upon them. He thought therefore there would be great danger of the measure failing, unless the Government reserved power to interfere in certain cases. In the next place, unless something were done to take the matter out of the hands of persons who would look mainly to dividends, there would be great danger that what was called economy would interfere with the public good. The experience of Glasgow, which was very nearly the same as that of Paris under M. Haussmann, would show that in the most favourable circumstances there must be great loss. He believed the loss in Paris was 32 per cent upon the amount actually invested in the operations; and that would be something like the probable loss in London and elsewhere. If, therefore, the medical officer was to start the improvement, as he was the creature of the vestry, and the vestry the creature of the people who had to pay the rates, very little good would be done. If the work was to be done by private, rather than public effort, there would be another source of danger. Once you got within the ambit of private effort, you got within the ambit of private gain; and where good dividends were looked for, it was not the class which Parliament wanted to benefit most that would derive the advantage, but the class above them. Any one who had gone through the low dens described by the Home Secretary, and had then visited the Peabody Buildings, must know that the two were inhabited by a very different class. The fact was, unless care were taken, they would be sweeping away one class of people to provide residences for another. In the Peabody and other buildings many people were charged 7s. 6d. a-week rent. That was very nearly £20 a-year, and to talk of people—who lived in such dens as the Home Secretary had described, and which the present measure was intended to abolish—paying £20 a-year—was simply absurd. If, therefore, Parliament wished to succeed in the object it had in view, they must deal with the matter on principles of philanthropy rather than of dividend. He would suggest therefore that they should not confine themselves to sweeping away the dwellings complained of, but take powers to alter and improve them if possible. He would at the same time offer another suggestion with respect to dwellings not structurally altered. Not long since a very interesting correspondence had appeared in The Lancet, in which revelations of a most painful character had been made. It had been found by commissioners appointed by that paper, that in many cases dwellings of five or six stories, with several rooms in each story and separate families living in each room, were supplied with water only at the lowest story. One instance was given of a poor woman in a wretched state of debility who had to bring every drop of water she required for her family up five flights of stairs in one small vessel. The consequence was that the water necessary for health could not be brought up at all. Assuredly something should be done to compel every landlord who let his houses in separate tenancies to provide separate water accommodation for each. He begged to thank the Home Secretary for making a brave, loyal, and earnest attempt to deal with one of the most pernicious mischiefs of our country at the present time.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, that the Bill was now in print, but there were some typical errors to be amended, and therefore whether it could be delivered to-morrow, or not until the day after, it was not in his power to say. He was in hopes, if the principle of the Bill was accepted, that the House would allow him to proceed to the second reading on Monday, on the understanding that some time would elapse before the Committee would be taken. The hon. and learned Member for Barnstaple (Mr. Waddy) had talked of the medical officers being influenced by the vestries and local boards. But, if he (Mr. Cross) was to judge from the reports which had been presented to him by the medical officers, he felt sure they would be willing to grapple with any authority in this matter. If such reports as had been presented to him were sent in to the local authorities, the latter would have plenty to do for several years in working the measure, and erecting suitable buildings. It was essential to the scheme that suitable dwellings should be built; for surely the hon. and learned Member opposite did not mean that when a number of rookeries were pulled down, other rookeries should be put up in their place. Precautions, however, were taken that when the local authorities let the land, certain provisions of a stringent nature should be carried out. Beyond that, hon. Members would find that the Government had inserted special powers in reference to the metropolis, and the appointment of persons to carry out the provisions of the Bill.

COLONEL MURE asked, whether the Bill applied to Scotland?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, that, as it stood at present, the Bill applied to England only, but that the Government intended to leave it to the Committee to decide whether its operation should be extended to Scotland and Ireland also.

Motion agreed to.

Bill for facilitating the improvement of the Dwellings of the Working Classes in large towns, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Secretary Cross, Mr. SCLATER-BOOTH, and Sir HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 1.]

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in rising to move, "That leave be given to bring in a Bill to consolidate and amend the Law relating to Friendly and other Societies, said: Taking into consideration the number of Bills that will be brought forward to-night, it is neither necessary nor convenient that I should occupy much time in asking the House for leave to introduce a measure for consolidating and amending the laws relating to Friendly Societies. The principles of the Bill I propose to lay before the House are mainly the same as those of the Bill of last Session, with which hon. Members are familiar. We propose to continue the present system of registration of Friendly Societies, but we propose to make such amendments in that system as will enable it to work with better effect. The Bill will, therefore, in the main be similar to that of last year; but during the Recess, a great many communications have been made to me by persons connected with and interested in these societies, and the Government, having carefully considered those communications, have made several Amendments in that measure. In framing those Amendments, we have borne in mind that this great system of Friendly Societies is one which has sprung from the people themselves, and that, therefore, in whatever alterations we might make in the system, we should be careful to carry the people with us, and to act in harmony with the work which is going on. I will now state in a very few words what are the principal alterations which we propose to make in the Bill. In the first place, we propose to make one great change in the measure as it stood last year, by abolishing the proposals for local registration. I am not at all sure that those proposals were not good in themselves, as they would have conduced to that which is the great object of this legislation—namely, the enlarging of the information to be laid before those interested in these societies. There were, however, two objections to those proposals which weighed considerably with us—one, that to carry them out would be very expensive; and the other, that we could not establish a system of registration by clerks of the peace, without running the risk of bringing about some want of uniformity in their decisions and views, a result that might lead to much confusion. Under these circumstances, we have dropped those proposals for local registration, and registration will be carried on in the same way as at present, except that the Registrars of Scotland and Ireland, who will be retained, will be subordinated to the chief office in London, and thus there will be but one system of registration for the United Kingdom, directed from a common centre, while the special peculiarities of each part of the Empire will be considered and met by having officers competent to decide any questions that may arise. We have also endeavoured to meet the objections which have been raised as to what are characterized as the too great powers which the Bill of last year proposed to give to the Registrars. It is, of course, inevitable, if a Bill of this sort is passed, that some power should be given to the Registrar, not for the purpose of putting power in his hands, or those of the Government, but for the convenience of the societies themselves. It would be utterly impossible to provide by legislation for every case that might arise, and if an attempt were made to do so, we should have a series of cast-iron rules, which would work most inconveniently for the societies themselves. It was, therefore, proposed by the Bill of last year to give certain powers to the Registrar with reference to certain particulars which would operate for the convenience of the

societies. However, we now propose not to give certain of those powers, and to modify some of the others proposed to be given. Among those which we do not intend to give is one of considerable importance. Under the Bill of last year, it was proposed that the Registrar should, under certain circumstances, have power not only to order the dissolution of a society upon the representation of a certain proportion of its members, but to re-arrange and alter the benefits and the contributions of the society. There can be no doubt that it would be a very convenient and useful power for a properly constituted authority to exercise. Cases will frequently arise in which the members of a society may find that they are going on in a way that must ultimately result in disaster, and that while it would be a pity to dissolve it, the rate of contribution must be increased, or the rate of benefits must be lowered, if they are to tide over the difficulty. We, however, find that an objection is entertained by the societies to entrusting the Registrar with such powers, and, as the main principle that we desire to carry out is to give information to the societies which they may utilize for themselves, and as we do not propose to interfere with their working in any unnecessary way, we have thought it right to omit that power from our Bill. Therefore, the powers of the Registrar in this respect will remain as they are at present, and whenever a petition is presented by a certain proportion of the members of a society, he will proceed as at present to investigate the grounds on which the petition proceeds, and, if necessary, to decree the dissolution of the society; but he will not have power to alter the amount of either the contributions or the benefits. Another provision of a rather important character we have omitted from the present Bill, merely because it is not convenient that it should appear in an Act of Parliament. It is that which directs that the Registrar shall cause tables of mortality to be prepared for the use of the societies. A good deal of misunderstanding has arisen on this point, and it has been supposed that if these tables of mortality were prepared and issued under an Act of Parliament, they would be regarded by the societies to whom they were furnished, as being compulsory, or at least as having a semblance of Government authority. Under these circumstances, we dropped that power; but, as we think it of great importance that proper tables should be prepared and issued to promoters of these societies, it is the intention of the Government to do that which they can do without an Act of Parliament, and that is to give directions for the preparation of a proper number of tables, applicable to as many different sets of cases as they can provide for, and to issue them for those who wish to take advantage of them. There will be comparatively few other alterations made in the Bill. It is proposed somewhat to alter the proportion of members who may call for a general meeting of the society; it is also proposed to omit certain words with regard to the appointment of public valuers, which have been misunderstood; and it is provided that that the valuers shall be appointed by the societies themselves, merely requiring that the name, address, and profession of such valuers shall be stated in the returns they may make, so that they may be known as persons of some standing. There will also be some change made with regard to the investments. At present the law requires that the investments of these societies shall be considerably restricted, and we propose to allow a much greater latitude in the form of their investments, in order to assist the societies to improve their position, subject to certain necessary precautions in the matter of publication and audit. The great principle of this Bill is that by it we recognize a state of things existing which we do not desire to interfere with or to disturb, but to assist and promote; and we desire, as far as possible, to provide for giving due publicity to the facts bearing on the status of different societies, so that those in whom the members have confidence may be able to tell them what appears to be the real position of the societies. Neither do we intend in any way to introduce unnecessary Government interference. On the contrary, our principle is to leave this good work which has sprung from the people to be carried on by the people themselves. We do not adopt the principle of "Everything for the people, and nothing by the people." We desire that the people should do this work for themselves, and our only wish is to assist them in doing it. I need only to refer to one other clause in the Bill, which is one of considerable interest—namely, the one which relates to the insurances on the lives of children, with reference to which there has been considerable agitation in the minds of those connected with these societies, and on the part of the public generally. I think that a good deal of misapprehension has prevailed on this subject. In introducing this clause into the Bill last year, nothing could have been further from the intention of the Government than to cast any imputation upon the parents of this country as a class, but it must be recollected that there are persons who may avail themselves of the laxity of the law on this subject, who are not the parents of the children whose lives are entrusted to them. We know that there are many cases in which unfortunate children who are the offspring of illegitimate intercourse are entrusted to unscrupulous and careless persons, who may be inclined to make money of them—we know the history of baby-farming, and how melancholy that history is, and it is a most beneficent principle of law which throws its shield over such unfortunates; therefore, in introducing this clause, we had no desire to bring a general charge against the parents of this country that they are not careful of their children's lives, nor to put any restriction upon their making a reasonable and proper provision for the burial of their children in the event of their death. We propose, however, to make some alterations in the Bill as it stood last year. We propose to do away with the restriction which it was intended to impose with regard to the insurance of children under three years of age, in so far as it extended to a prohibition of insurance in more than one society. We think that prohibition unnecessary, and that there are cases in which it would be better to insure for small sums in more than one society, than for a large sum in a single society. As regards the amount, we propose to limit it to £3 instead of 30s. in the case of a child under three years of age, leaving the sums for children under five and ten as before. It is further intended that certificates should be granted in a more formal way than at present, so as to prevent any mischief which might arise from that cause. In this respect it must be remembered that there will be an exceptional privilege granted to the societies with which we are dealing, for it is one which does not extend to persons who wish to insure in the upper and richer class of society. I think there are no other points to which I need draw attention. I hope there will be no objection to the introduction of the Bill, and from all that reaches me, I believe there will be no great difficulty in inducing the House to pass the second reading. Of course, when we come to a discussion of the Bill in Committee, there will be many points demanding consideration. We trust the House will be prepared to agree to the second reading within a reasonable time, and an ample opportunity will be given for the discussion of details. I hope we shall be able to pass this measure, for it seems to me one which would be of great advantage to the classes for whose benefit it is designed. It has been framed, as I have shown, with no desire to interfere restrictively with the operations of these societies, but on the contrary, to facilitate and advance them. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving for leave to introduce the Bill.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, he approved the omission of the provisions in the Bill of last year authorizing the Registrar to prescribe alterations in the rules of the societies. These societies had been founded by the people, and it was right that they should be left to be managed by the people with as little interference as possible. But the right hon. Gentleman proposed to leave to the Registrar the power of dissolving a society whenever he thought proper to do so. That was an extreme power, and he would suggest that before exercising it the Registrar should be bound to inform the society of the defects he found in its affairs, so as to afford it an opportunity of making whatever change might be needed. In that way, the dissolution of a society might be averted.

MR. SALT said, he must acknowledge that the Bill of last year had been improved. It had always seemed to him that a system of local registration might be attended with considerable difficulty, and he was disposed to think the change in regard to the regulation of investments would prove beneficial. As to the other alterations, they would be better able to judge of them when they saw the Bill. The chief question to his mind was whether the Bill was bold enough to meet the difficulties of the case, and he thought it right to take the earliest opportunity of suggesting this point for the consideration of the right hon. Gentleman. He would also urge the desirability of allowing a considerable time to elapse between the second reading and going into Committee, so as to afford persons in the country who were practically engaged in connection with Friendly Societies an opportunity of studying the details of the measure.

MR. W. HOLMS said, he must congratulate the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the manner in which he had introduced the Bill. He was glad to find the right hon. Gentleman had adopted many of the suggestions made to him last year, and especially that the proposal to create local Registrars had been abandoned; for he believed that such a system would give rise to a serious want of uniformity in the operation of the law. He was gratified, moreover, by the proposal to limit the powers of the Chief Registrar, which under the former measure would have been almost unlimited, and he heartily concurred with the right hon. Gentleman in thinking that the adoption of the rules published by the Registrar should be made optional, as there were many societies of a peculiar character to which they might not be applicable. As to the clause determining the number of members who might call a meeting to investigate the affairs of a society, if it had been retained as in the Bill of last Session, many large societies might have been put to very great inconvenience and expense by a very small number of troublesome persons. He fully approved likewise of the clause relating to the insurance of children. It had been observed by the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Salt) that the Bill was not sufficiently bold. For his part, he thought that it lacked nothing of that quality. In dealing with these societies, it was necessary to remember that they had been founded by working men for themselves, without the aid of the State, and they did not stand in need of any nursing, or interference in their internal arrangements. All that was required was that there should be such legislation as would protect the members from fraud so far as Government could do so, and thus give the public confidence in their management, and that certain lines should be indicated beyond which they must not go. He agreed in thinking that they ought not to go into Committee on the Bill for a considerable time after the second reading, the time fixed for which he should like to know. By doing so they would permit of the provisions of the measure being thoroughly discussed by the people who were interested in the different Friendly Societies throughout the country.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the Bill would be in the hands of hon. Members to-morrow (Tuesday). He proposed that the second reading should be set down for that day week, and would assure the House that ample time would be allowed between the second reading and the Committee.

MR. MUNDELLA said, that day week was too early for the second reading.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to consolidate and amend the Law relating to Friendly and other Societies, ordered to be brought in by Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, Mr. Secretary CROSS, and Mr. WILLIAM HENRY SMITH.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 2.]

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in rising to move for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the Law relating to Regimental Exchanges said, the measure was one which he had introduced late last Session, and which there was not then time to go on with. He had explained the nature of the Bill last year, and had been very anxious that it should come on for discussion. He did not however propose on the present occasion to enter on that discussion, which would not be advantageous to the House; and he knew that hon. Gentlemen opposite, who were anxious to take part in discussing the Bill, and who were opposed to it, would not offer any opposition to its introduction. Those hon. Gentlemen had asked him not to fix the second reading for an early day, and in deference to their wishes he would fix it for that day fortnight, instead of for Monday next, as he had originally intended.

MR. TREVELYAN said, that although the Bill was drawn in few and simple words, he believed its consequences would be neither few nor simple. He was glad therefore the right hon. Gentleman had named a somewhat distant day for the second reading, because it was most important that hon. Members should have an opportunity of studying the bearings of the question, which was most complicated in its nature, and the details of a proposition which was of a distinctly retrograde character as concerned the legislation of this country, and would have a very deep effect not only upon the Army, but upon the whole circle of our public services. When the day fixed for the second reading arrived, if no more qualified person stepped in to undertake the task, he should move that the Bill be read upon that day six months, and he earnestly hoped that he should be able to make good the few words he had now spoken to the satisfaction of the many and perhaps a majority of hon. Members.

MR. ANDERSON said, that when at the close of the last Session the right hon. Gentleman withdrew the Bill, and intimated his intention to re-introduce it, he himself announced that he would again oppose it, Her Majesty's Opposition was then nowhere. He (Mr. Anderson) had to complain of considerable apathy on their part; but he hoped that on this occasion the announcement that they had just heard from the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Border Burghs meant that Her Majesty's Opposition under their new Leader really intended to take up that most objectionable Bill and give it something like a strenuous opposition. It was undoubtedly the most retrograde and re-actionary measure that the Government had yet attempted, with the solitary exception of the Endowed Schools Bill, and on the second reading he should be most happy to join with the hon. Member for the Border Burghs in opposing it.

MR. HAYTER said, he did not rise to give the Notice of Motion which he had intended to give—namely, to read the Bill a second time that day six months—because his hon. Friend the Member for the Border Burghs (Mr.

Trevelyan) had already done so. But he would remind the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War that that Bill applied to all regimental ranks, and that under the Army Regulation Act the ranks of major and lieutenant-colonel were to be filled by selection. Surely it could not be intended that when an officer had been selected to fill a special post he should then be permitted to accept a bonus in order to exchange into a regiment which might be more convenient for him? He had to thank his right hon. Friend for postponing the second reading till Monday week, because he must remind him that that Bill introduced a totally novel principle—namely, that of giving a Parliamentary sanction to payment for exchanges—a principle altogether unknown in every other service of the Crown.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to amend the Law relating to Regimental Exchanges, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Secretary HARDY and Mr. STANLEY.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

Acts read; considered in Committee.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY, in rising to move—

“That the Chairman be directed to move the House, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Merchant Shipping Acts,”

said: The necessity for the amendment of the Merchant Shipping Acts arises not so much from want of powers in the Executive Government, for the powers already given are not yet half developed, although they are being developed as rapidly as I think they safely can be. What is rather wanted is a supplement to former Acts, enabling the Executive to exercise existing powers more effectively. The difficulty in dealing with the subject is to give the Executive adequate powers for securing public safety without interfering with the freedom of private enterprise. I am sure the Committee will all agree that freedom is essential to mercantile enterprise, and that mercantile enterprise is of the essence of our national prosperity. Since the Protective system ceased it is more than ever imperative that the Legislature should leave unfettered the self-dependence and elasticity of our Mercantile Marine. On the other hand, we must all allow that the eager competition of mercantile enterprize tends to becoming reckless of human life, and on that account the Legislature have found it necessary to interfere for the public safety. They have done so. Since the repeal of the Navigation Laws the principal Act has been the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854. From that time down to the year 1873 frequent amending Acts have been passed. In that year the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Plimsoll) called more active attention to the subject, and stimulated legislation—as I freely admit, most creditably to himself and most usefully to the country. At the same time it must be borne in mind that he only stimulated legislation which was then in progress, and that the Act passed after he brought the subject so much forward was simply a confirmation and extension of the Act which had preceded it by two years. In 1873 Her Majesty issued a Commission to the Duke of Somerset and others to inquire into the subject, and the Royal Commissioners collected a mass of the most authoritative evidence, and made a most able Report. I suppose everyone in the House who is at all interested in the matter is well acquainted with that Report. Of the suggestions made by the Royal Commission, some of the most important are not ripe for immediate legislation. The subject of marine insurance, for instance, though I believe it to be at the root of the whole matter, could not be dealt with hastily or immediately by legislation until some concert had been taken with other nations. Such correspondence we are now engaged in. When I say that marine insurance is at the root of the whole matter, I mean that those who degrade the Merchant Service by using unseaworthy ships are rendered more reckless by the present state of the law on marine insurance. Another subject not yet ripe for legislation is pilotage, and a third relates to tonnage dues, which—and I myself had painful experience of this last year—cannot be dealt with here as yet on sound principles with any chance of securing international agreement. Some of the suggestions made by the Royal Commissioners, not requiring legislation, have been at once carried out, and the present Bill proposes to carry out the remainder. For example, we have strengthened the Marine Department of the Board of Trade by adding a second nautical adviser. We have improved the organization of the surveying staff; and here I may say that it was impossible to do so more quickly, for the men were not to be found. We have also added to the Department a law adviser, who will conduct prosecutions for the Board of Trade. The other suggestions of the Royal Commission require legislation, and with these points the Bill deals. They may be ranged under four heads, and in this respect the Bill follows the divisions of the principal Act of 1854 in order to avoid as much as possible rendering more complicated legislation which is too complicated already. The Bill deals with the discipline on board merchant ships; the safety of ships and those on board; improved inquiries into casualties at sea; and the training of boys for service at sea. I may, perhaps, mention that I have had prepared by the Board of Trade a digest of all the existing Acts on the subject, on the plan of the Digest of Sanitary Acts, which was prepared in 1873. I had to-day the pleasure of laying on the Table this digest of the Merchant Shipping Acts, and, as there is a complete index, I hope it may almost supply the place of an actual codification of the law. I will now state briefly to the Committee the mode in which the Bill proposes to deal with the four subjects of discipline, the safety of vessels, inquiries into casualties, and training boys for the service. With regard to discipline, the Royal Commission say, in their Report, that the evidence affords ample proof that masters of vessels have not at this moment sufficient control over their men, and that the men can be guilty with impunity of the grossest dereliction of duty. Following their suggestion, the Bill will propose, in the first place, to render illegal the system of advance notes. The object of that alteration is to save the sailor from the crimps, who are at the bottom of the want of discipline in the Merchant Service; and the Bill provides, at the same time, means by which sailors may get any necessary outfit from the shipowners. Then we recast what I may call the criminal code of the Marine Service. The Bill takes out of the hands of the Board of Trade and the local Marine Boards, charges against certificated officers—that is, masters, mates, and engineers—and places all such proceedings in the hands of stipendiary magistrates; or, failing them, in the hands of the local Admiralty Courts. At the same time, it is proposed that all Assessors should be appointed, not, as hitherto, by the Board of Trade, which ought to be the prosecutor, and should not, therefore, share in the office of Judge, but by the High Court of Admiralty. It is also proposed that if, before the new tribunal, a certificated officer should be convicted of incompetency, his certificate should in no case be suspended, but should be cancelled, either wholly, or with a lower certificate substituted. As to the offences of seamen, the Bill proposes to repeal all the existing enactments on this subject, and to make a better classification, graduation, and arrangement of many scattered enactments constituting what may be called the criminal code on board ship. The only addition to the list of offences—and it is strange that at such a late hour it should be necessary to make such an addition—will be neglect to keep a look-out or sleeping on the watch. A new principle will be introduced, by which double punishment will be inflicted in cases of drunkenness and other offences committed under circumstances which endanger the ship, or the lives of those on board. The Bill also proposes a somewhat more easy and summary process in the case of all offences short of mutiny. On this point I may say that a measure is in contemplation, enabling Her Majesty to enter into Consular Conventions with other Powers, which will enable Her Majesty to make mutual arrangements with those Powers for bringing the law to bear in foreign ports. So much as to discipline. Now as to the safety of ships and seamen. The principal Act of 1854 contains one whole part—Part IV.—relating to the safety of the ship and prevention of accidents. The Act of 1862 improved those provisions. The Act of 1871 imposed upon the Board of Trade the delicate and difficult duty of stopping unseaworthy ships, and also made the sending such ships to sea a misdemeanour. The Act of 1873 increased the duties of the Board in the way of stopping ships from going to sea on the score of unseaworthiness or overloading. As to Government survey, the Bill does not depart from the principle, now acted upon, of obtaining good and trustworthy information, and dealing only with cases which are reported as suspicious. The Committee, probably, know what is done now in the way of legislative survey. Besides the survey of all ships on the first Registry, the Board of Trade surveys passenger ships annually, stops all ships suspected of being unseaworthy, enforces repairs or alters loading, and takes legal proceedings in certain cases. I agree with the Royal Commissioners that a general periodical Government survey of all ships would, even if possible, be most mischievous and vexatious, and not only that, but I will go further and say that it would be fatal to its object; because if the Government were to certify continually all ships in the Merchant Service, it would be impossible, in the case of any casualty, that anyone but the Government should be made responsible. On the other hand, on the principle which has been adopted by Parliament, and which we continue to act upon, proceedings against ships reported to be unseaworthy have led almost invariably to conviction and punishment. Every such case acts also as a general warning to owners of unseaworthy ships, and this course of action tends to the total eradication of unseaworthy ships from the service. We altogether decline to certify the whole Mercantile Navy; a course which would not only be vexatious in itself, impede improvement, and shackle our commerce in foreign competition, but which would relieve shipowners of the liabilities which are the chief security of public safety. The Bill makes other provisions for safety by dealing with overloading, deck-loads, supply of boats, adjustment of compasses, and by increasing the liability of ship-owners for damages to persons or property on board arising from the unseaworthiness of ships. As to overloading, we see no possibility of making a compulsory load-line. On the contrary, we think the attempt would be most mischievous and delusive; but we do adopt the suggestion of the Commissioners that there should be an added scale of feet downwards amidships to test the buoyancy of ships, as a caution against overloading, as affording instructions to the surveyors, and as a record and evidence in case of casualty. As to deck-loads, we do not entirely adopt the recommendation of the Commissioners, but we do to this extent—that every ship carrying a deck-load should report to the Customs the weight, bulk, and character of any such cargo, and should also have an entry to that effect in the log-book. The various regulations as to the provision of boats in the Acts of 1854 and 1862, and the Passenger Acts, are all reduced in the Bill to a uniform principle, with elastic rules to meet special cases; and the adjustment of compasses we propose to entrust only to persons who have been examined and certified as competent for such a duty. As regards the liability of ship-owners, we propose to make it unlimited with respect to any damage to persons or property on board, caused by their having knowingly, and without excuse, sent unseaworthy ships to sea. Lord Campbell's Act is also extended to seamen. The Bill proposes to make a charge on the Mercantile Marine for the training of boys for the Merchant Service. Lastly, it makes a material improvement in the system of investigating casualties, separating the first inquiry into the circumstances and causes of any casualty from any criminal proceedings subsequently taken against all who appear to have been culpable. The preliminary inquiry by the Receiver of Wrecks will remain the same as it is, except in so far as regards its extension to foreign ships and boats, the omission of the condition of material damages having been incurred, and a slight improvement in the nature of the evidence. The formal inquiry which may follow the preliminary one will be simply an inquest, and taken altogether out of the hands of ordinary justices and placed in the hands of stipendiary magistrates with Assessors appointed by the Admiralty, so that the Board of Trade will stand altogether clear of any judicial action, ready to take criminal proceedings in the ordinary Courts of Law as prosecutor against guilty parties. These are the main enactments proposed by this Bill, which is a measure entirely independent of party. Drawn up with careful attention to the Report and collection of evidence of the Royal Commission on the subject, I hope it will, with perhaps some modifications, be accepted by the House. The question, though not a party one in any way, is one of great national interest; and I believe, after having carefully considered the matter with those who are best able to give advice, that the Bill will be found calculated to ameliorate the condition and character of our merchant seamen, place the shipowner in a sounder and more satisfactory position before the law, and at the same time enable the Department, on which a delicate and difficult task is imposed, to develop more vigorously the powers with which it has been entrusted.

Mr. PLIMSOLL said, that when first he heard the Government intended to bring in a Merchant Shipping Bill his hopes were highly raised, and he felt like a shipwrecked sailor who saw a sail in the horizon bearing down towards him; but now he had ascertained what kind of a measure it was, he felt like that shipwrecked sailor would feel when, the ship having come quite close to him, it suddenly altered its course and left him to his fate, with the only consolation that his case would be inquired into when the vessel reached home. Since he had listened to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, he must confess his hopes and the expectations in which he had indulged had undergone a similar diminution. The President of the Board of Trade had certainly respected the rights of property, and the right hon. Gentleman had told them he did not wish to interfere with the freedom of commerce. The Committee had also had the old bugbear again dangled before them. They were told that ship-owners would be held responsible for wrong-doing. He maintained that responsibility in this case was an utter delusion, because as a rule the registered owners were not the actual owners of the ships, and thus it would be most difficult to punish the proper parties. Before proceedings could be taken against a ship-owner, it would be necessary to prove that he had previous knowledge of the ship's unseaworthiness, and it would be found that the Bill in this respect was an utter delusion. The existing law on this point was practically inoperative. The President of the Board of Trade had told the Committee that shipowners could be made responsible; but he would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it was not a fact that only one firm had been punished? and he would also ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he thought that even they would have been done anything to if they had been Members of Parliament? The Board of Trade would rely on the detection of vessels on certain information afforded to them. What kind of information did they require? The right hon. Gentleman had also said he would decline to certify the whole of the Mercantile Navy of the country. He (Mr. Plimsoll) never proposed anything of the kind. What he said had reference to unclassified ships, and to the necessity for their examination. He wished to direct the attention of the Committee to a case which had recently happened. On the 19th of December last he received information from a most reliable source, which he could thoroughly trust, that the owners of the La Plata were sending out the Sydney Hall, with the remainder of the cable which the former ship had to lay, in a very unseaworthy condition. The fullest particulars were given to him as to the repairs which were necessary, and he was told that 46 seamen would be taken on board the next morning. The information was so specific that he at once sent a messenger up to Whitehall begging the Board of Trade to stop the ship, offering at the same time the name of his informant, but said that he would rather have the responsibility placed upon his own name. At 10 o'clock at night a special messenger came to say that the Receiver of Customs was to detain the vessel, but with the distinct assumption that if the information proved erroneous, he should indemnify the Board of Trade and the owner of the ship for all costs and charges. He (Mr. Plimsoll) did not shrink from that responsibility, and the vessel was stopped; and he subsequently learned that the vessel had been condemned by the Board of Trade, and a large quantity of repairs were ordered to be done upon her. The owner protested against this, and offered £100 for the name of the person who had given the information; and he also called in an independent surveyor, but that gentleman certified for more extensive repairs than had been ordered by the Board of Trade. Now, if the Board expected any one to give them information, which could only be given at the peril of the person giving it, he asked the Committee how much information that Board was likely to get? He believed that the Board had acted only on information so forwarded to them; but, practically, the only persons who knew what was the condition of the ship were the people on board, and people who had business relations with the owner; and neither of these classes of people could give information without running the risk of sacrificing their means of livelihood. It was in vain to suppose that, under such circumstances, information would be forwarded to the Board. The right hon. Gentleman, in introducing the Bill, said he adopted the recommendation of the Royal Commission to the effect that a scale in feet should be marked upon every merchant vessel amidships, to indicate the number of feet she was out of the water. This was a step in the right direction; but he would observe that they already had from every port a statement of the amount of free-board, and to paint such matter upon the side of the vessel would not be much more useful. Moreover, unless the unit adopted was much smaller than a foot, the use of the scale would be of little use in the case of many ships sailing from English ports. He had a record of one vessel which was loaded with iron, and which left in mid-winter with less than 11 inches of free-board. A steamer—the Volga—left Cardiff in 1873, having 15 feet depth of hold, and the return stated that she had only one inch of free-board. By his direction a letter was written to the Board of Trade to know if there was any error in the return, and the Board replied that they saw no reason to doubt it. There were two other vessels, each having 13 feet depth of hold and loaded with iron, and they had respectively 4½ and 7½ inches of free-board. The Committee had been told that in future there would be more strict inquiries in the case of ships which were lost; but what he wanted to see was the adoption of a system under which the loss of ships would be prevented, at any rate to a very considerable extent, by a careful examination of them before they were allowed to proceed to sea. One-half of the losses would be prevented by the expenditure upon preliminary examinations of the money which was now found necessary to pay the expense of Board of Trade inquiries into the circumstances attending the loss of vessels and the enormous waste of human lives. On the whole, the measure introduced by the President of the Board of Trade was weak and ineffectual, and seemed to fall lamentably short of meeting the requirements of the case, for the reason mainly that it contained no provision for the surveying of ships and none to prevent over-loading.

MR. T. BRASSEY, as a Member of the Royal Commission on Unseaworthy Ships, said, the Commission approached the consideration of the important questions referred to them with the most perfect impartiality, and the most sincere desire to arrive at a sound and just judgment upon the matters referred to them for investigation. With respect to the question of load-line, it was right to mention that in no other maritime country had it been thought judicious by the Government to insist upon the principle of a load-line in the Merchant Navy, the different circumstances necessary to be considered in fixing a maximum load-line being so complicated, as to make it practically impossible to insist on any uniform rule. At the same time, the Commission felt that it was essential not to absolve shipowners from all responsibility in this matter. In common with all those who took an interest in the subject, he wished to acknowledge in the fullest manner the immense services which had been rendered by the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Plimsoll) in directing public attention to this question. He thought, however, that the hon. Gentleman was mistaken in respect to the extent to which loss of vessels at sea was to be attributed to over-loading. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade had stated very truly that the condition of the law in reference to marine insurance lay at the very root of this most important subject. In the present state of the law, there were many cases in which the insured could recover more than the value of his ship if it happened to be lost, and it was most desirable that the law should, if possible, be amended, and marine insurance limited to indemnity for losses actually sustained. If the present state of things could be revised, it would be a most desirable consummation, and he trusted the Government would not lose sight of the point. If no other means could be adopted, a Commission should be appointed to inquire into and report upon the question. He was glad to find that the Government had strengthened the Board of Trade in its Marine Department; but a still further development in this direction would be necessary, if the country was to rely upon the action of the Department to enforce the laws which Parliament had passed.

MR. GOURLEY said, he was disappointed with the Bill as being too severe, and rather than accept the Government Bill, as indicated by the President of the Board of Trade, he would give a preference to the Bill introduced to the House some time back by the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Plimsoll). The Government measure left it to the shipowners and shipmasters to determine the seaworthiness or otherwise of the ships; whereas, in the Bill of the hon. Member for Derby, rules were laid down for guidance in that respect. It was an attempt to place the shipowners in the position of unlimited liability companies, for the loss of passengers going to sea in their ships, so that the result of a single accident might be to reduce a millionaire to poverty. There were already on the Statute Book, Bills relating to merchant shipping, which contained not less than a thousand clauses, and to these it was proposed to add another lengthy measure—a course the only effect of which would be to make “confusion worse confounded.” The principle of prevention would be much better than seeking for a remedy after a disaster had occurred. In his opinion, the first thing which the Government ought to have done was to have introduced a Bill with the object of codifying the existing laws on the subject of merchant shipping. Owing to the enormous number of statutes with reference to the shipping interest, it was quite impossible for masters of ships and shipowners to understand what course they should take. The right hon. Gentleman proposed to repeal the Amendments to Lord Campbell’s Act, but what did that mean? It simply meant that shipowners, instead of registering their ships in England, would register them in other countries, where they were safe from the responsibility this Bill sought to impose on them—namely, unlimited liability for loss of life and property. He admitted there were some things in the Government measure which he thought would be a considerable advantage, and one of those was the prevention of over deck-loading. He was also very glad that it was proposed to abolish advance notes, and he suggested that the shipowners and shipmasters should be permitted to pay the wages of the seamen on board ship directly they arrived in port, instead of at the shipping offices. In that way, they would be able to keep the men out of the hands of the crimps. His own opinion was, that the only way out of many of the difficulties that had arisen was by appointing a competent staff of surveyors, to have a proper survey, especially if they were to insist upon a recognized load-line. He did not think there need be any insuperable difficulty in carrying out such an idea. It was dealt with at New York and Montreal. For his own part, he would rather have a regular survey and a load-line applicable to the build of the vessel, fixed when first loaded in some degree such as was suggested by the hon. Member for Derby, than be subjected to the uncertainties and inconveniences of the existing law.

Mr. RATHBONE thought it would be better to discuss the merits of the Bill on the second reading, when they had the details before them; for the hon. Member for Derby had told the House that the Bill was utterly weak and ineffectual, while the junior Member for Hull had said it was so stringent that he preferred the recommendations of the hon. Member for Derby. He (Mr. Rathbone) could not agree with the junior Member for Hull that it was desirable to codify before they amended a branch of the law—quite the contrary, amendment ought to come first and codification afterwards. He thanked the right hon. Gentleman for the promise he had given that the law should be digested.

Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE said, that on a future occasion he would be quite prepared to discuss all the details of the Bill; but, on the present occasion, he should abstain from doing so. He was glad that some legislation was to be attempted on the subject. It was not, and ought not to be regarded as a party question, and the sole object of the House ought to be to abate human misery and preserve life. The right hon. Gentleman proposed to give aid on a liberal scale to training ships for the Mercantile Marine, the money to be provided out of the Mercantile Marine Fund; but as that fund was contributed by the shipowners, the proposal would, in fact, be a tax upon them. Besides, foreign shipowners contributed to the fund in question, and it was worthy of consideration how far they ought to contribute towards the training of boys for the British Mercantile Marine. The right hon. Gentleman would, he trust, lay upon the Table full details with regard to these points at a future stage of the Bill. In dealing with insurance, the right hon. Gentleman said, the assent of foreign Governments to the main portions of the proposed clause must be obtained; but it appeared to him that in the Report of the Royal Commission several recommendations were made which did not so much affect the general law of insurance, as the special law of this country, and which might have been judiciously included in the Bill. He had no doubt, however, that the right hon. Gentleman would be able to show the Committee that he had taken steps to procure the assent of foreign Governments to some greater changes in the general law.

Mr. WILSON, as the representative of a large shipping community, wished to express his opinion that the proposals of the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Plimsoll) were more likely to tend to the preservation of life at sea than the programme sketched out by the President of the Board of Trade. Prevention was better than cure, and if a survey was to be of any real practical use, it ought to be made before the vessel was sent to sea, and not after the mischief was done. The general feeling in Hull was that it was comparatively useless to make surveys, and to institute inquiries, after a ship had been lost and the lives of the seamen sacrificed. Again, many practical men, in common with himself, were of opinion that there was not the slightest difficulty in fixing a load-line, and shipowners would be much better pleased if such a course were adopted. In all our ports, associations of shipowners, of ship-masters, and of sailors and firemen had been formed, and it appeared to him that such associations, acting to some extent in antagonism to each other, were doing more to damage our mercantile supremacy at sea than was commonly imagined. The Government, while shrinking from the responsibility of fixing a load-line, actually held Courts of Inquiry and punished a captain who was supposed to have exceeded the limit of safety. How could anyone expect captains of vessels themselves to do what Her Majesty's Government, backed up with the assistance of a large staff of surveyors, declined to undertake? In the course of the last few weeks, the captain of a steamer belonging to Hull had the misfortune to lose his vessel; but, although he saved the lives of all on board, and stuck by her to the last, his certificate had been suspended for 12 months. Great indignation prevailed at Hull in reference to this case, and an appeal had been made to the Board of Trade, but as yet no action had been taken by that Department in the matter.

MR. D. JENKINS said, he was glad the Government had taken this important question out of the hands of private Members, but he regretted the Bill did not go further. For example, it ought to have provided for the compulsory survey of all unclassified ships; and he trusted that when the Bill was in Committee, clauses would be inserted providing for that object.

MR. E. J. REED hoped ample opportunity would be given for the discussion of the Bill, for he could hardly believe an Administration so strong as that which now occupied the Treasury Bench would be content to introduce a measure which simply did as little as possible in satisfaction of a great public demand. In his opinion, our merchant shipping could not be properly dealt with by the Board of Trade until that body was itself dealt with. The present Bill did not provide those guarantees for safety which many hon. Members thought necessary; but, at the same time, such parts of the measure as were good would be welcomed. His present impression was that the Bill did not deal with the whole question on a sufficiently broad basis, and he hoped the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Plimsoll) would insist upon the adoption of many of his requirements.

Motion agreed to.

Resolved, That the Chairman be directed to move the House, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Merchant Shipping Acts.

House resumed.

Resolution reported.—Bill ordered to be brought in by Sir CHARLES ADDERLEY, Mr. CAVENDISH BENTINCK, and Mr. WILLIAM HENRY SMITH.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 4.]

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON, in moving—

"That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the measures adopted by the Government of India under the authority of a Despatch, No. 160, dated the 8th day of August 1866, and to report whether it is expedient to insist upon the deductions from the bonâ fide claims of Officers referred to in an humble Address from this House of the 28th day of June 1870," said, the claims of the officers of the East Indian Army, referred to in the Motion, had been frequently before the House. The system of purchase in that service had sprung up at the beginning of the present century. It was the custom of junior officers to pay sums of money to their seniors to retire, in order that they might obtain promotion, and when the Directors of the East India Company became aware of the existence of the practice, they informed the officers of the Army that they would not enforce a regulation which compelled the officers on promotion to take an oath that they had not given any pecuniary compensation for the step they obtained, and this they did, being satisfied that the purchase system tended to efficiency, and the bonus system in question was established. The Mutiny intervened, and the re-organization of the Army consequent upon it introduced changes which deprived officers who had retired of the compensation which, under the old regimental system, they might have obtained from their juniors. It was contended on their behalf that they were legally entitled, by the Parliamentary guarantee, to compensation for their loss; but the tribunals to which the question was submitted decided that the officers had no legal claim, and Sir Charles Wood therefore declined to entertain it. Lord Cranborne, however, when Secretary of State for India, proposed a scheme of compensation under which the officers injuriously affected by the amalgamation scheme would receive—as was calculated—about £160,000, and the carrying out of the scheme was to be spread over 20 years. On the estimate made the amount to be paid to the officers during the nine years which had elapsed would be about £100,000, but in fact all that they had received was £35,000. In the year 1870, the late Colonel Sykes moved in that House an Address to Her Majesty on the subject of those claims, and, although the late Government opposed the Motion, it was carried by a considerable majority. The Address was, perhaps, capable of two interpretations; but, at all events, the late Government took no action upon it, except to direct further inquiry to be made. Lord Salisbury, in the House of Lords, when the Army Regulation Bill was under consideration, urged upon the attention of the Duke of Argyll, then Secretary of State for India, the fact that the compensation provided for officers of the British Army would naturally increase the sense of grievance entertained by the officers of the Indian Army, and expressed a hope that their claims would be favourably considered. Nothing, however, was done, and the present proposal was practically to refer to a Select Committee the subject of the Address which was carried five years ago. The reason the Motion was made thus early in the Session was that a Select Committee on East Indian Finance was about to sit to complete certain inquiries as to which they had taken evidence, but had not yet reported. Before doing so, they could easily, in a few sittings, dispose of this subject, which he now moved might be referred to a Select Committee. An agitation, which was essentially a House of Commons agitation, had been going on for some time; but it was impossible to make a concession that would please everybody, or discuss it satisfactorily in that House, therefore it was he took the course proposed.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR congratulated the noble Lord upon the clear manner in which he had explained to the House the way the bonus system of the Indian Army had originated, there being only one omission—that relating to the Directors of the East India Company offering to grant annuities on favourable terms in aid of subscriptions for the officers, in order to induce old officers to retire. He also thanked the noble Lord the Secretary of State for India for authorizing the appointment of this Select Committee, thus ensuring a near settlement of the question to which this Motion referred. It was an inquiry which would gratify the officers whose claims were to be the subject of it, and get rid of an agitation which had been allowed to exist for too long a period. So great an agitation for so small a sum was much to be lamented, but the inquiry need not occupy the Committee for more than a few days, because they had simply to determine whether they could, in propriety and fairness, recommend the extent of the concession that should be given to the officers.

Motion agreed to.

Select Committee appointed, “to inquire into the measures adopted by the Government of India under the authority of a Despatch, No. 160, dated the 8th day of August 1866, and to report whether it is expedient to insist upon the deductions from the bonâ fide claims of Officers referred to in an humble Address from this House of the 28th day of June 1870.”—(Lord George Hamilton.)

And, on February 15, Committee nominated as follows:—SIR GEORGE BALFOUR, MR. BRASSEY, MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, MR. DENISON, LORD ELCHO, MR. FAWCETT, LORD GEORGE HAMILTON, SIR HENRY HAVELOCK, MR. HERMON, COLONEL JERVIS, and SIR HENRY WOLFF:—Power to send for persons, papers, and records; Three to be the quorum.

BANKERS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

(In the Committee.)

MR. GOSCHEN, in moving that the Chairman be directed to move the House, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Bankers Act, said, he might, perhaps, be allowed, as the title of the Bill did not carry any explanation with it, to state its general effect. No English bank that had the right of issuing bank-notes could come to London, or set up a branch within 65 miles of London, without sacrificing its issues. On the other hand, there was no provision to prevent the Scotch banks—and it was believed to be a casus omissus in the legislation of 1844-5—from coming to London, although they did not thereby forfeit the right of issue. The anomaly had been witnessed in actual operation, because the National Provincial Bank of England had sacrificed its issues in order to come to London, while the Scotch banks need not do so, although they were able to bank in the North of England under conditions forbidden to English banks. He did not take up this question as a question of banks against banks; but in the public interests it was undesirable that the bank monopoly should increase in value. The Scotch banks already enjoyed considerable privileges, and if they were allowed to trade in London, while the English banks could not increase their issues, the value of the monopoly would be increased, and it would be more difficult to deal with it by future legislation, if the House should feel inclined to do so at a future time; therefore, on that ground it appeared to him and others that something should be done. He would explain the Bill in detail on the second reading.

Lord George Hamilton

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER inquired whether the Bill was intended to include Ireland?

Mr. GOSCHEN said, that the Bill as it was drawn touched the Scotch banks only, but he believed it might be made to include Ireland. He should be prepared to deal with that question if it were found desirable to raise it.

Mr. ANDERSON said, that if the Scotch banks crossed the Border they did not bring their note issue with them. There was no objection to the English banks going into Scotland if they pleased—in fact, they did so, and traded there as they wished—and for that reason he should oppose the Bill.

Motion agreed to.

Resolved, That the Chairman be directed to move the House, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Bankers Act.

House resumed.

Resolution reported:—Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. GOSCHEN, Mr. WEGUELIN, and Mr. BARING.

PRESENTED. FIRST READING.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, I have to ask your Lordships to give a first reading to a Bill to Amend the Judicature Act of 1873. The Bill which I am now about to lay on your Lordships' Table is so completely identical in its general proposals with the Bill I introduced last year, and which your Lordships passed through this House, that I shall not think it necessary to detain you by any general explanation of the features of a measure with which your Lordships are already well acquainted. I shall mention only this—that as the time drew near for bringing into operation the Act of 1873 some matters of detail were discovered with regard to that Act which required correction, and which it is proposed to amend by this Bill. These your Lordships will easily observe when the Bill is in your hands, and it will be more convenient to defer the explanation of them until that time. But there is one change which I ought to mention, and it is this:—Those of your Lordships who attended to the framing of the Act of 1873 will probably remember that there was a Schedule to the Act containing some 60 Rules of Procedure, which were declared by the Act not to have the force of an Act of Parliament, but were to be Rules of Court, open to alteration or repeal, without the sanction of the Legislature, by the same authority which has the power to make Rules of Court now—namely, the Judges of the Court. And your Lordships will probably recollect that, in addition to those Rules, there was special power given in the body of the Act to Her Majesty in Council to make further Rules in regard to practice and procedure, before the statute came into operation. Those further Rules were to be made by the Sovereign in Council on the advice and responsibility of the Judges of the Court. In the course of last year this power of making Rules was acted on to this extent—that a body of Rules was drawn up with great care and attention under the direction of the Judges, and received their unanimous approbation. They were ready to be submitted to the Queen last year; but, in point of fact, they have not yet been submitted to Her Majesty. My Lords, it appears to me that it would be highly inconvenient if we had, in regard to procedure, one body of Rules on the Schedule of the Act of 1873 and another body of Rules not contained in that Act or in the Schedule of the Act, but outside the Act, in a code approved by the Judges and sanctioned by Her Majesty in Council. Obviously it would be more convenient, whatever the Rules may be, to have them all in one code, and not be under the necessity of passing for them at one time to the Act of Parliament, and at another to a collection outside the Act. I am bound to say that at the time of the passing of the Act of 1873 it would have been impossible to avoid this, because the Rules in the Schedule were the only ones then ready to be laid before Parliament. The other Rules did not come into existence till the autumn of last year. The course I propose to take is this—I propose in the Bill which I am now about to lay on the Table that the Rules to regulate procedure and practice under the Act of 1873 shall all be contained in one code, and that this code shall derive its force from an Order in Council. This was what was contemplated in respect of the second set of Rules; but if your Lordships should pass this Bill the whole of the Rules will derive their authority in that way. They will all be in one instrument, and will all be subject, after the passing of the Act of Parliament, to alteration by the Judges like any other Rules of Court. I do not think it necessary, my Lords, to make any further explanation with regard to this Bill, and I shall, therefore, move now that it be read the first time.

Bill to amend and extend the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, presented by The Lord Chancellor.

LORD REDESDALE said, he took this occasion to express again a hope that their Lordships would not part with the Appellate Jurisdiction of their Lordships' House without taking the opinion of the Legal Profession in England. From what he had heard he believed firmly that the opinion of that Profession was in favour of the retention of the Appellate Jurisdiction of that House. The proposal for the transfer had come before their Lordships under very peculiar circumstances. It was introduced by the late and the present Lord Chancellor in turn, and those two noble Lords being joined in support of it commanded party and official votes on both sides of the House, and it was therefore supposed to have a more general approval in their Lordships' House than it really had. The impression also that the proposal commanded general support outside the House had for some time prevailed almost universally; but since last Session there had been a movement on the subject. There had been a movement among the English Bar, and a Committee, which included some very eminent members of the Profession, had been formed for the purpose of preserving the Appellate Jurisdiction of their Lordships' House. On that Committee he found the names of Mr. Watkin Williams and Mr. Waddy, both Queen's Counsel and Members of Parliament, and both advanced Liberals. He found on it the name of another Queen's Counsel, also a gentleman who formerly had a large practice in the Southern States of America, and was now eminent at the English Bar. The transfer of the Appellate Jurisdiction from their Lordships' House had not been called for by any section of the public, and no Commission or Committee had reported in favour of such a measure. The opinion of the Profession in Ireland and Scotland had been expressed, and in both countries that opinion was against the transfer. Reasons which their Lordships could well understand might have prevented the Profession in England from giving an earlier expression of its opinion; but ought their Lordships' House to make so great a constitutional change, and one so much affecting the character of that House, without knowing what the feeling of the Profession in this country was? There was no reason why their Lordships should not have the opinion of the Judges on the subject. No great delay would be caused by obtaining the opinion of those best able to form an opinion on the question—namely, the Legal Profession, including the Judges.

LORD SELBORNE: My Lords, it was with great satisfaction I heard from my noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack, that the Bill which he has laid on your Lordships' Table is substantially the same Bill as passed through your Lordships' House last Session. The change regarding the Schedules of Rules I regard as merely formal; because I understand that the Rules in the Act of 1873 will remain substantially the same. I have no reason to complain, and I do not complain, that my noble Friend the Chairman of Committees should take on this occasion, as he did on that of every stage of the Act of 1873, and every stage of the Bill of last year, and on all other possible occasions, an opportunity of protesting against the transfer of the Appellate Jurisdiction of your Lordships' House; but I hope my noble Friend will excuse me if I do not follow him into the general question. I decline to do so—first, because the Bill for that transfer received your Lordships' sanction after many attempts—all ending in failure—to amend the Appellate Jurisdiction of this House, and render it efficient for the purposes of a tribunal of ultimate appeal. Difficulties had from time to time arisen, which demonstrated the impossibility of making such Amendments.

This was shown to your Lordships by the results of experience extending over more than half a century. These results were brought before your Lordships in detail, and those who may not wish to hear the details repeated, will find them among the pages in which what takes place in this House is permanently recorded. My second reason for not following my noble Friend in the general question is, that should it be necessary to do so before the passing of the Bill now before your Lordships, my noble Friend, no doubt, will afford me another opportunity. But coming to the particular suggestions of my noble Friend, I would ask, What are the Judges to be consulted about? Is it about amending an Act of Parliament passed two years ago, which, though its operation is in abeyance, is the law of the land, and by which you have agreed that in substitution for your Appellate Jurisdiction there shall be one Final Court of Appeal, which is to collect within itself all final Appellate Jurisdiction so far as England is concerned? Are the Judges to be consulted as to whether that Act is to be repealed—whether the new Court of Appeal is to be made nugatory for the purpose for which it was constituted?—whether by Act of Parliament your Lordships should cling to a jurisdiction which you do not now possess, or which you are in possession of only for a period of time which will elapse before the Act of 1873 comes into force? I venture to say that such a course would be one wholly without precedent in either ancient or modern times. If my noble Friend does not mean that, does he mean that the English Judges ought to be consulted as to whether the Act should be extended to the Scotch and Irish Appeals? If Judges are to be consulted on that point, they ought to be the Scotch and Irish Judges; but it appears to me that no precedent could be found for that course either, and I cannot but express my surprise that so staunch an advocate of the privileges of this House as my noble Friend should propose that this House, in dealing with its own jurisdiction, should go outside itself and ask the opinion of another body. I hope your Lordships' House will take no such course. I do not think you will, but it may be some comfort to your Lordships to be reminded of facts to show how unnecessary and unprofitable such a course as my noble Friend proposes would be in this instance, even if it were otherwise an unobjectionable one. Two years before the Judicature Act of 1873 was laid on the Table of the House, the most eminent—if one may make a distinction between such eminent persons—certainly the most eminent in station of the Judges of England, stated as the result of his careful consideration of the subject, and of his criticism of proposals at that time before the House, that the time had come when your Lordships would best consult your own dignity by surrendering your shadowy jurisdiction as a Court of Final Appeal, which stood in the way of putting the Appellate Jurisdiction of the country on a stronger and more satisfactory footing. That was the opinion of the Lord Chief Justice of England; but the case did not rest on the opinion of even that most eminent person. The question had been before the Judges, the Legal Profession, and the country at large for two years; but at the same time that I placed it on the Table of your Lordships' House, I thought it my duty to communicate it to every Judge sitting on the Bench in this country, and not from one of them did I hear any disapproval of the proposal for the transfer of the jurisdiction of your Lordships' House. When I say not from one of them, I believe that to be the literal truth; but certainly it is the substantial truth that not one of them expressed disapproval of that proposition, while by some of them, at least, concurrence was expressed in the opinion stated by the Lord Chief Justice. With regard to the Bar of England, your Lordships' memories cannot be so short as that you can suppose the Bill passed without its having been considered by the Bar of England. Circumstances obliged me to delay some of the stages in the Bill to a length that brought some censure on Her Majesty's Government—because it was supposed that the Bill was being endangered by the delay—and therefore a full opportunity was given to the Profession for a careful consideration of all its provisions. Now, among other difficulties which I had to encounter—and no one can deal with such subjects without encountering great difficulties—was one arising from objections on the part of members of the Profession for whom I have a great respect to the fusion of Law and Equity; but not from any one of them did I receive any complaint as to the proposed transfer of the Appellate Jurisdiction of your Lordships' House. Your Lordships assented to that proposal not only after full opportunity of knowing the opinion of the Judges and the Profession, but after all possible opinions had been taken. Are your Lordships now to be told that you ought to pause and take the opinion of the Judges and the opinion of the Profession before you pass a measure which is merely complementary of the Act to which you have given your assent?

LORD REDESDALE: It is quite a different thing.

LORD REDESDALE: Hear, hear!

LORD REDESDALE: No, no!

LORD SELBORNE: Well, I think my noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack will agree with me that this Bill only makes an amendment which is complementary of the Act. But you are to pause because there is a movement going on, and because a committee has been formed having as two of its members two eminent and able Members of the Profession and of the other House of Parliament, Mr. Watkin Williams and Mr. Waddy, and as another of its members another learned gentleman, Mr. Benjamin, who occupied a high official position under Mr. Jefferson Davis, and now occupies a high position at the English Bar? Is that a reason why this House should go outside its own walls for light to govern its own wisdom? Such a proposition is not one that I should have expected to hear from my noble Friend.

LORD REDESDALE: There is a difference as to appeals. This Bill gives a second appeal.

LORD SELBORNE: My noble Friend denies that the Bill is merely complementary of the Act of 1873 because the Bill gives a second appeal; but the Act of 1873 gives a second hearing. The difference between its provisions relating to a second hearing and those in this Bill regards the composition of the Court and a definition of the cases in which there is to be a second hearing. However, that is not the question now. If it should be gravely argued that this is not a complementary Bill, but one substantially different from the Act of 1873, I am perfectly willing to deal with that argument; but for the present I hope your Lordships will refuse to listen to the proposal of my noble Friend the Chairman of Committees.

LORD HATHERLEY: My Lords, this is not the moment to discuss the repeal of a most important clause in a most important Act of Parliament; but as to the suggestion made by the noble Lord the Chairman of Committees that we should consult the Judges, I would remind your Lordships that when, three years ago, my noble Friend was taking a part—a very useful part—in a Committee which was considering the question of the Court of Ultimate Appeal, he had an opportunity of bringing forward his proposal to consult the Judges. He did not do so. But if your Lordships had consulted them at that epoch, they would have been found to be in favour of the transfer, whatever may be their views now—and I am not acquainted with them. It is quite true that the Committee finally made a recommendation of a different kind from that embodied in the Act of 1873, and, under the guidance of my noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack, proposed an arrangement similar to that of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. But after all that, with the advantage of a full inquiry by the Select Committee, and with the recommendation of that Committee before you, your Lordships deliberately sanctioned a Bill for the transfer of your Appellate Jurisdiction, which received the approval of the other House in the presence of numerous lawyers, including Mr. Watkin Williams, who had a seat in the House of Commons at that time, though I do not know that Mr. Waddy had. As regards the Bill before your Lordships, I entirely concur in the proposal as to the Schedule. When I brought in my Bill as Lord Chancellor, I was of opinion that such an arrangement would be the better one; but a contrary view then prevailed. I cannot but be glad at the change.

LAND TITLES AND TRANSFER BILL.

PRESENTED. FIRST READING.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, I have now to ask your Lordships to give a first reading to another Bill which also, to a great extent, is one proceeding on the same principle as a Bill of last year passed by your Lordships' House, but stopped in its progress through the House of Commons—a Bill to simplify titles and facilitate the Transfer of Land in England. I say it is, to a great extent, the same; because when your Lordships have the Bill in your hands, you will find that the arrangements of the Bill of last year have been considerably altered; and that as regards the drawing, that Bill has been abbreviated and its enactments have been greatly simplified. But there is one point of difference between this Bill and that of last year, which I think I ought to at once notice and explain. The first Bill by which it was proposed to register title to land, which I had the honour to introduce in the other House of Parliament in 1859, did not propose to make registration compulsory in every case. It was voluntary, and left to the option of those who might think their title would be improved if registered. The Bill introduced two years ago by my noble and learned Friend who preceded me on the Woolsack (Lord Selborne) proceeded on a different footing as regards compulsion. It did not make registration compulsory in the case of an estate not changing hands, but provided that wherever, after the lapse of a certain time—I think two years—the estate was bought and sold, the title must be placed on the register. It further provided that if it were not so placed, the buying and selling would only be regarded in the light of a contract to buy and sell, but would not pass what lawyers call “the legal estate” of the land. When I introduced the Bill of last Session I followed the course marked out by my noble and learned Friend, but I extended the term within which the obligation was not to come in force from two years to three. As the Bill was in its progress through Parliament last year I had communications on the subject from all parts of the country; and on going into details I acquired a great deal of information of which I confess I had not been previously in possession. I will tell your Lordships what surprised me very much. In one particular neighbourhood—that of Birmingham, I think—there are in the course of the year a great many hundreds—I think I may say thousands—of cases of buying and selling pieces—or rather “parcels”—of land. Your Lordships would be astonished to hear how small are some of those transactions—how minute the portion of property, and how comparatively inconsiderable the amount of purchase-money. There are parts of England in which a great deal is done in buying pieces of land just large enough to build a cottage on. It was made clear to me that these sales are not conducted in the way in which people make out a title to land—no title is attempted to be made out—they are transacted entirely on the faith of the solicitor, who has been conducting business in the particular neighbourhood for a long time, and is supposed to know it thoroughly. He draws up the deed on perhaps a sheet of paper, and besides the stamp, the purchaser has to pay but a very small sum in the way of law costs. I have heard of cases in which these latter charges are so small as 20*s.* or 30*s.* Now, it is clear that it matters not how cheap we make the cost of registration—if a title is to be put on the register, there must be some investigation of title, however small; and it would be impossible in a system of registry to compete with the small expense on which these minute transactions are now conducted. Therefore, before the Bill of last year left your Lordships' House, I proposed to exempt from the operation of the compulsory clause all cases in which the purchase-money did not reach a certain amount. I think £300 was the sum I named—but I was obliged to arrive at any conclusions in a rough form. Since last year I have given the subject much consideration, and I have arrived at the conclusion that it must appear somewhat anomalous to introduce a compulsory registry and then draw a line between a purchase of greater and one of lesser magnitude. It is extremely difficult to fix the point at which the line should be drawn. And there are some further considerations which have to be borne in view. I thought it necessary to ask the question—What, after all, is gained by a compulsory registration of this kind? Your Lordships will observe that the compulsory registration proposed was not one of all estates, but merely of those which were the subject of bargain and sale. This would at once except from this clause of compulsion the great bulk of the landed property of this country; because we knew that the great proportion of the land never changes hands at all, and never becomes the subject of bargain and sale. Therefore, the course proposed would not effect the object we have mainly in view, which is, to have all the land of the country on the register. Then, again, even when dealing with those portions of the land which are the subject of bargain and sale, there must be exceptions, whether you fix the minimum at £300, £200, or £100. But there would remain still these sales of a class over those small limits; and in these, however stringent you might make your compulsory clause, the ingenuity of conveyancers would be able to defeat it. It is impossible—if persons are unwilling to register—to compel them to do so. Already, means have been suggested by which anyone who did not wish to come under the compulsory clause might escape it. It is necessary, therefore, to go somewhat further. Moreover, my Lords, there appears to me to be a further difficulty in making a measure of this kind compulsory at the outset. If you do so, it appears to me you cannot stop short of establishing all over the country district registries; because, obviously, it would be a great hardship for persons living in remote parts of the country, and who were anxious and willing to conduct a sale without coming to London, to have to come to London for the purpose of placing on the register the title of the land which is proposed to be sold. Of course, that difficulty could be obviated by establishing district registries; but then to establish registries all over the country would be a measure of fresh expense, and one in which we should hardly be justified without experience as to the desire of buyers to avail themselves of the register. These considerations, my Lords, have led me to think that the proper way is to proceed in the hope that the registration will commend itself to the owners of land as making the land more negotiable, and therefore more valuable. If that commends itself to the extent of making owners go to the register in that way, just as it is acted upon throughout the country, we shall be able to decide as to the places in which it will be necessary to establish district registries; and we need not incur expense in this way until it is required. For these reasons, my Lords, there is not in this Bill the clause of the Bill of last year which made registration compulsory. There will be no obligation on those who are buying and selling to register the land, the subject of the bargain and sale. With these observations, I beg to move the first reading.

MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT.

MR. DISRAELI: As I observe that there is no Business on the Paper for to-morrow, I beg to move that this House, at its rising, do adjourn till Thursday.

Motion agreed to.

HYDRANTS.—QUESTION.

MR. FRESHFIELD asked the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works, Whether his attention has been directed to the danger and inconvenience resulting in the case of fire from the want of hydrants in the thoroughfares of the Metropolis?

SIR JAMES HOGG, in reply, said, the attention of the Metropolitan Board had been directed to the question of providing hydrants for assisting in the extinction of fires in the metropolis. This matter was one which required very careful consideration, and it was now being investigated by one of the Board's Committees.

THE NEW LAW COURTS — SUPREME COURT OF APPEAL.—QUESTION.

MR. FRESHFIELD asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether a site has been provided in the buildings in course of erection for Consolidation of the Law Courts for the Supreme Court of Appeal; and, if not, whether any and what arrangement has been made for its accommodation?

LORD HENRY LENNOX: Mr. Street's plans for the new Courts of Justice having been approved before there was any idea of making a change in the Judicature, no special apartment for the Supreme Court of Appeal has, by that name, been included in the new buildings; but, by the courtesy of the Society of Lincoln's Inn, their old dining-hall has been made over to the Government. It has been suitably fitted by the Office of Works, and restored to its previous dimensions, and is now, I am informed, admirably adapted to be the First Court of Appeal.

QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether the statement, as reported, made by the secretary of his department, the honourable Member for South Norfolk, viz. that,—

"As far as he was concerned, he had heard nothing whatever of the intention of the Government to bring in any Bill this year upon the question of highways, and therefore they would, he supposed, drift on in the present unsatisfactory state for a little time longer;"— and whether that statement accurately represents the intention of Her Majesty's Government, or whether they intend, during the present Session, to bring in any general measure of legislation to deal with the question of the future management and maintenance of roads, and especially with a view of relieving the ratepayers of various parishes?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH: No one can be surprised that my hon. Friend should have taken the earliest opportunity of asking this Question. In reply to it, I fear that it will not be practicable, having regard to the pressure of existing engagements, to introduce within the present Session a comprehensive measure on the subject of highways, dealing with all the important matters which incidentally mix themselves up with it.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON gave Notice that, under these circumstances, he would take an early opportunity of bringing forward a Motion on the subject.

FOREIGN OFFICE—DEFECTIVE LIFTS.

QUESTION.

SIR HENRY WOLFF asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the attention of the Government has been called to the proceedings of an inquest held on the body of Charles Coxhead, whose death, on the 2nd of December, 1874, was caused by the defective arrangements of the lift at the Foreign Office; whether any accident, though not of a fatal character, had previously occurred from the same cause; and, whether, during the two months that have elapsed since the death of Charles Coxhead, any alteration has been made in the lift or the arrangements connected with it, in compliance with the recommendations of the coroner to prevent the recurrence of similar calamities?

MR. BOURKE: The attention of Her Majesty's Government has been called to the melancholy accident which occurred on the 2nd of December. I am informed that an accident of a far less serious character occurred in connection with the lifts some time ago. I am not aware of any other casualty having happened. Since the death of Coxhead alterations have been made in the arrangements connected with the lifts, and the Foreign Office is still in communication with the Office of Works with a view of making those arrangements entirely secure.

METROPOLIS—EXPLOSION IN THE REGENT'S PARK.—QUESTION.

SIR THOMAS CHAMBERS asked the First Commissioner of Works, What steps are being taken to restore the bridge in the Regent's Park destroyed by the explosion on the Regent's Canal in October last, great public inconvenience being occasioned by the stoppage of the road into the park at that spot?

LORD HENRY LENNOX: Owing to the uncertainty that has prevailed as to who is responsible for the cost of rebuilding the bridge, no steps have yet been taken in that direction. But, being very sensible of the great inconvenience arising to the public from the present state of matters, I will undertake personally that there shall be no further delay in the restoration of the bridge than is absolutely necessary.

NATIONAL SCHOOLS (IRELAND)— SCHOOLMASTERS.—QUESTION.

MR. SHEIL asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether Her Majesty's Government proposes to introduce any measure during the present Session, with the view of improving the position of the National Schoolmasters in Ireland?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in reply, said, that the question was still under the consideration of the Government, and that he hoped to be able to take an early opportunity of proposing some change.

STROUD WRIT—RESOLUTION.

MR. CHARLES LEWIS, in rising to move—

"That no new Writ be issued for the Election of a Member to serve in this present Parliament for the Borough of Stroud, in the room of Henry R. Brand, esquire, whose Election has been declared void," said, he should venture to ask the sanction of the House to that Resolution, in the first place upon the ground that what was now proposed to be done was only the exercise of the fitting discretion which the House undoubtedly possessed; and, in the second place, on the ground that by passing such Resolution the House would be doing a merciful act to the much-distressed borough of Stroud itself. It would be his duty to establish the first position in order to justify the interference of the House with the primæ facie constitutional right of the borough, and with that object he would direct attention to the electoral history of that borough during the last 12 months. From an electoral point of view the history of the borough of Stroud had, he ventured to say, been wholly unprecedented. It was only necessary to go back to the election antecedent to the General Election of last year, and to trace the electoral history of the place downwards, in order to find the following prominent facts:—There were four elections in the space of seven months. Every election was petitioned against upon the ground of corrupt practices. All the Petitions were tried save the one that was set aside by the sudden occurrence of the Dissolution on the 24th of January, 1874. Owing to that event, the Petition against the return made in the earlier part of that month could not lawfully be heard. All the three elections which had occurred since the Dissolution, including the one immediately consequent upon it, had been the subject of judicial inquiry—the first on Petition against the two Members who were returned, the second on two separate Petitions against the two Members returned, and the last on a Petition against the Member elected in lieu of the one who was turned out. It must be a matter of satisfaction for the House to know that, in the result of those inquiries, however much they might have reflected on the electoral character of the borough and its constituency, no stain rested on any one of the four Gentlemen who had been evicted from the seats to which they had been elected, and that they had been all free from any participation in the practices of which their agents and supporters had been found guilty. In the result we had this state of facts, that the election which took place in the borough in February at the General Election was wholly set aside; that the election which took place in May to fill up the vacancies caused by the eviction of the two Members who were returned at the General Election was partially set aside, one Member holding and one losing his seat; that the election in July of a Member to supply the place of the one previously unseated also resulted in that Member losing his seat. Every one of those inquiries turned on the question whether corrupt practices sufficient to invalidate the election had existed. The inquiries into the elections of February and May were not carried to their legitimate conclusion, but were stopped by the person petitioned against surrendering his seat under the strain of the evidence already adduced. It was important to recollect that circumstance as part of the strong evidence of the existence of corrupt bodies of men forming a large portion of the constituency of Stroud. It was important also to look at the nature of the Reports of the Judges on each of the three occasions in question. The election in January, 1874, was upset on the ground of corrupt practices; and Baron Bramwell in his Report stated that the inquiry was intercepted not only by the surrender of the seats, but also by the absconding of persons from the neighbourhood, whom the Judge believed to be important and necessary witnesses for the due investigation of the whole case. The same most experienced Judge—in accordance with the terms of the Act of Parliament under which a Commission of Inquiry should be sent down to the borough—said in his Report—"I further report that corrupt practices have extensively prevailed at the election to which the Petition relates." He would ask how came that Report of the Judge to be passed by without any action in the nature of appointing a Commission being taken? A point of law was debated whether, as the corrupt practices in question consisted of treating, it was possible under the terms of the Act to have a Commission; and although some eminent lawyers in that House thought it was not, others took a different view, and he ventured to think the question was one that required consideration. Baron Bramwell, who tried the second Petition, as he did the first, in his second Report significantly referred to his former Report, and stated that he abided by it, but said he had no reason to believe that corrupt practices extensively prevailed at the election in May. Only one of the two Members returned in May was unseated. He was unseated on the ground of bribery; and the seat was only defended for a very short time. In the concluding part of his Report the Judge said there was evidence of bribery by others, but that the respondent withdrew from his defence of the seat, and certain persons not having been called, he could not report that bribery had been proved against them. In consequence of that, no action was taken to suspend the writ, and in July last a new election was held, which was also petitioned against. Baron Pigott tried that Petition, and made a most elaborate Report, which was laid on the Table of the House, in which, in the first place, 13 persons were reported by name as bribed by five other persons, and also by some persons whose names were unknown. In addition to that, there were several cases of out-voters who said they had been canvassed by strangers, of whom the agents of the sitting Member denied all knowledge, and had received excessive fares for travelling. It was stated further that that mode of bribing out-voters was carried on by the introduction of two persons from a neighbouring west-country borough, not undistinguished in the annals of Parliamentary Election Petitions; that by a person named, who was engaged in canvassing, four voters were proved to have been bribed, the bribes varying from 2s. 6d. to £2. All knowledge of that person also was denied by the agents. The Election Judge devoted four paragraphs, at the conclusion of his Report, to a most suggestive matter—the various methods in which funds were got up for disposal in ways that would not bear inquiry. Accordingly, they had a statement as to what was called a Decoration Fund, which was raised between February and July, to meet a claim of £1,200 for decorations at the February Election—a fund which, by a most remarkable idiosyncrasy, appeared to have been raised after the election to which it applied. Baron Pigott said that that fund was stated to have been subscribed to pay for a large number of flags and banners at the February Election, when the borough was spoken of as having “gone mad,” but that it was not shown how it had been expended; that some accounts had been produced, and some receipts, but he was not able to say whether a portion of it was applied to the purposes of the July Election; but there was enough to show that it had not been altogether applied to the purposes for which it was subscribed, or expended in ways that were wholly free from suspicion. But the peculiarity of the learned Judge’s Report did not end there. It appeared that in that remarkable election, the agents of the sitting Members went through the double process of importing bribers at the time of the election, and of exporting bribers at the time of the Petition. The learned Judge spoke of persons who were imported for the purpose of bribing, and of persons who were exported at the time of the Petition, in order that they might not give inconvenient evidence. The persons imported were proved to be James Yard Coles and John Bishop Daniels. Amongst other cases were those of very remarkable gentlemen. One of them rejoiced in the name of Heaven, and he (Mr. C. Lewis) supposed had been removed to Hades, to be out of the way. He, at all events, absconded early in November, just as the Petition was coming on, in order to prevent those disclosures which he might have made in his evidence. But the exportation did not end there, for it appeared according to the Report, that there was a very inconvenient witness, for whose future comfort it was thought necessary that he should change the locality of his residence. He referred to a Mr. Joseph Workman, who, it seemed, it was deemed desirable to induce to go from Birmingham to Liverpool, and thence to emigrate with his family to America, the Judge reporting that John Bishop Daniels and Joseph Daniels, who came from Taunton to do any work that there was for them, were engaged in sending them away. The Judge, in the last paragraph of his Report, said—

“I have no reason to believe that corrupt practices have extensively prevailed at the election to which the Petition relates;”

but with the greatest possible respect for the distinguished person by whom the Report was signed, he would venture to remark that if the word “no” had been left out, there would certainly have been more consistency between the preamble, the premises, and the result. Such, then, was the history of the borough of Stroud between the months of January and July, 1874, and he thought the House would admit that it was a history of corruption of every form and kind, from the lowest and most insignificant up to the worst and most flagrant; for he believed that the sitting Members at the February Election lost their seats chiefly because of some breakfast which was given by innocent Nonconformist ministers, who had asked a few of their supporters to partake of tea and toast previous to going to the poll in the morning. But the electors having been treated leniently by the Judges, grew more daring in their delinquencies. It was proved that on the occasion of the election in May, the millowners, who had for years been working their mills on the polling-day, were suddenly affected with the most kindly consideration for their hands, so that they reversed the system of Pharaoh’s tale of bricks without straw, and not only dismissed their men from the mill for the day of the election, but also paid their wages for the day; while in July, the amount of corrupt talent in Stroud not being found sufficient, strangers were imported, and extravagant travelling expenses paid, while inconvenient witnesses were got out of the way, no matter at what cost. Now, all that showed, in his opinion, that the borough was radically bad, as far as electoral corruption was concerned. He would now pass from that point, and endeavour to show that the House of Commons could exercise its discretion in the matter, and, if it should think proper, suspend the writ for a fresh election. He would so far modify his Resolution as to make the suspension general, without binding the House with respect to any future Session of Parliament. Dealing with the question in that light, it might be convenient to consider how matters the distribution of its political favours, that it inspired neither sanguine hope nor gloomy despondency as to what its political opinions might be in the future. Therefore, they might calmly discuss the question of issuing the writ of election; but in so doing it must be remembered that the House was dealing with one of the highest of properties by the light of Parliamentary principle and precedent. It seemed to him that there were very grave objections to the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry (Mr. C. Lewis). The hon. and learned Member had altered his Motion twice, if not three times. First he proposed that the issuing of the writ should be suspended for the present Session, not for the purpose of taking any action, not for inquiry, not for disfranchisement, but simply as a form of temporary punishment, just as a refractory child was put for a time into a corner or a rollicking undergraduate was rusticated for a term. This might, perhaps, be a proper method of dealing with an adult constituency; but he could only say that it had not, up to the present, been the rule or the practice of Parliament. The Motion of the hon. and learned Member was, in his view, entirely irregular. It, as originally drawn, proposed to bind future Sessions, and, if passed in that form, would have left it open to any hon. Member at any future time to bring forward a Motion for the issue of the writ. As it at present stood, the proposition of the hon. and learned Member would apply only to this Session, but for that period was to be clear and definite, the writ to issue afterwards, if in the meantime Stroud had become good again, and could safely be taken out of the corner. But who was to vouch for this? Was the House to judge of Stroud by the light of anonymous letters written by gentlemen whose names could not be given to the House? How, again, was the House in future Sessions to judge whether or no the writ should issue? The House had no judicial information on the question, and the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry had not proposed that, by means of a Commission or otherwise, the necessary information should be obtained. Was the House to be guided by paragraphs in newspapers or this kind of street gossip which, to his surprise, the hon. and learned Member had introduced into the debate?

Sir William Harcourt

It was below the dignity of the House to take cognizance of paragraphs in newspapers, or to be governed by opinions contained in letters whose authors' names could not be mentioned in the House. The hon. and learned Member had asked the House to create a new precedent in Parliamentary practice. This was not a light thing; for the practice of Parliament was the law of Parliament—a law which affected the rights of the whole country, and particularly the rights of constituents. The course suggested could not be followed, therefore, except for far graver reasons than the light and shadowy ones in which the hon. and learned Member so largely dealt. A great part of the Constitution of this country depended upon precedents of this kind, and the stability of our political system rested upon the existence of fixed rules of practice in matters like the one under discussion. The House was not to be guided by a sentimental desire to perform merciful acts for the benefit of much distressed constituencies, or to consult social arrangements and family comforts such as were described by the writer of the anonymous letter which had been read. The practice of Parliament was clear in relation to the subject-matter of the Motion, and was, he ventured to say, precisely the opposite to that which the hon. and learned Member had laid down. There was one authority in this House which they all well respected, who had stated with the greatest accuracy what was the practice in the issue of writs for Parliamentary election. Sir Erskine May, in his work on the Law and Usage of Parliament, stated that—

He would not venture upon his own authority to attempt the difficult task of proving a negative; but he was fortified by the authority he had just quoted when he said that, with the exception of the case to which reference had been made by the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry, no writ had ever been suspended except for the purpose of some ulterior action either by the issuing of a Commission or a proposal for disfranchisement.

chisement. The case of Stafford, to which reference had been made, so far from being an exception to the rule, was a strong exemplification of it. On the 6th of August, 1833, Sir Thomas Freemantle, as Chairman of the Committee which inquired into the circumstances attending the Stafford election, reported the resolution of the Committee, which was in effect that the evidence established such a case of general and systematic bribery and corruption as rendered it expedient that the borough should cease to return Members to Parliament. Thereupon a Bill for disfranchisement was introduced.

MR. CHARLES LEWIS said, the suspension he referred to in the case of Stafford occurred not in 1833, but in 1835.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he had before him all the records relating to Stafford, and they went on to the Session of 1836, when the disfranchising Bill was introduced. It was not necessary to detain the House with precedents when the rule was clear; but he might mention that from the year 1775—as described by Rowe on Elections—down to the present time the recorded and continuous precedents, were all in support of his view, that the issuing of writs had only been suspended pending subsequent and decisive proceedings. This view had been from time to time enunciated and maintained by no less eminent authorities than Mr. Goulburn, the late Sir Robert Peel, and Mr. Williams Wynn. The last-named gentleman, referring to the exceptional case already alluded to, said “the precedent was one not to be followed, but to be studiously avoided”—[3 Hansard, lxi. 608]—and the eminent authorities who took part in the debate were agreed that the suspension of the issue of writs could only be justified by an intention to proceed further in the direction of inquiry or disfranchisement. In the same debate Sir Robert Peel said—

“He really thought that if Gentlemen were permitted to take their own views, in cases of this kind, without knowing about the constituency in question, it was impossible to say what might be the result.”

The right hon. Gentleman also said—

“That the House ought to be careful how it interfered with the rights of the constituencies to have Representatives in that House . . . that it would be a dangerous precedent for the House to interfere with the rights of the constituencies, and that, if they once began to exercise that power, there was no assignable limit to the abuse of it.”—[3 Hansard, lxiii. 869.]

The hon. and learned Member for Londonderry said the issue of a writ might be suspended for a week or a month by a Resolution of the House. If that was so, then the House by a Resolution might suspend the issue of a writ for ever, and thus disfranchise a place. The power of suspending the issuing of a writ ought not to be exercised except for grave considerations, and after full reflection as to the consequences of the precedent that might be established. The electoral history of Ipswich was far worse than the electoral history of Stroud, and yet Sir Robert Peel said he would not oppose the issue of a writ for Ipswich. In the former case, there was the Report of a Committee that extensive electoral corruption had taken place in the borough. A writ was issued, and another election took place; and then a second Petition occurred. On the 1st of August it was reported that corruption had extensively prevailed, and on the 8th of August a writ was issued for the second time that year. And a great Parliamentary authority, Mr. Charles Buller, with reference to the case of Ipswich, said—

“It was sought to disfranchise a whole constituency, because of the faults of a few—a proceeding to which he was adverse, because he thought that the vengeance of Parliament ought rather to be directed towards those who gave bribes than towards those who took them. He objected also on the ground that it was unfair to punish all for the faults of a few. It appeared that since the Reform Bill, Ipswich had more frequently than almost any other place had its representatives unseated for bribery; but it also appeared that in no instance had it been shown that any large portion of the constituency were bribed. The largest number of persons accused of bribery at Ipswich appeared to have been about 70”—he (Sir William Harcourt) believed about six times as many as had been accused at Stroud—“and of these not more than 30, as far as he could judge from those best acquainted with the place, had been proved to be guilty.”—[3 Hansard, lxxv. 1173.]

He would put this consideration to the House: There was a broad distinction between setting aside a particular return and suspending or annihilating the electoral rights of a constituency. A return might be set aside upon proof of bribery; but when they came to the other question—that of annihilating or suspending the electoral rights of a constituency—

they came to a question which he must be permitted with great respect to state was not within the competence of one House of Parliament to entertain. They could not disfranchise a borough without a Commission of Inquiry, with a view to disfranchisement, and without the assent of the whole Legislature—of the Commons, the Lords, and the Crown. What was the House now asked to do? It was asked to do something a great deal more than merely to issue a Commission. A Commission of Inquiry was not issued except in cases where the Judge had reported that there had been extensive bribery at an election. The hon. and learned Member for Londonderry asked the House to disfranchise, at least temporarily, a whole borough on account of the reputed offences of a few electors. Now, that seemed to him to be a strange proposition to come from the Conservative benches. It was a proposition to give the go-by to the House of Lords and to the Crown. The hon. and learned Member for Londonderry said his object was to punish this borough; but it was not in the competence of the House of Commons to punish a borough, except with the co-operation of the House of Lords and of the Crown. He (Sir William Harcourt) would ask hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House to consider what would be the consequences of assuming such a power as the hon. and learned Member asked them to assume, and which had never hitherto been assumed. On previous occasions when the House of Commons suspended a writ it had been merely as a step to further proceedings; but that was not the case here. The hon. and learned Member had not pretended that this Motion was made as part of a proceeding for inquiry, or part of a proceeding for a Bill to be submitted to both Houses of the Legislature. He (Sir William Harcourt) hoped that Liberal Members would not maintain the doctrine that a constituency might be deprived of its electoral rights simply by a Resolution of the House of Commons, and he should be extremely surprised to find such a doctrine maintained by occupants of the Ministerial Bench. If the House of Commons once allowed itself to determine questions of this kind according to its impression, what would be the result? What use would be made of a precedent of that description in violent times?

Sir William Harcourt

He would illustrate it by a very celebrated case, the expulsion of Mr. Wilkes from the House of Commons. Suppose that some Member had come forward and said—"The last election for Middlesex was a very turbulent affair; in all probability Mr. Wilkes will be returned again for Middlesex, therefore let us suspend the writ for Middlesex." He (Sir William Harcourt) ventured to say the House would not have done so unconstitutional a thing. Take another case, that of the Clare election, when party spirit ran so high on the question of Catholic Emancipation. Suppose that, on the question of issuing a new writ for Clare, a Member had objected to the issue of a writ on the ground that a Roman Catholic Member would be again returned who, by the Constitution of this country, could not take the oath or a seat, and had therefore proposed, like the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry, as a merciful arrangement, that the writ should be suspended. There might be violent times when the two sides of the House were racing for a vote, and then they would form very different opinions as to what would be merciful for particular boroughs, according to the view they took of what would be the result of a particular election. Take the case of Baron Rothschild when he was returned, in the first instance, for the City of London. Suppose that the issue of a writ for the City of London had been suspended on the ground that the City would again return a Jew. If hon. Gentlemen thought there never would be times again when a violent party spirit would have an effect on matters of this kind, he had a very different opinion from them. He had no wish to disparage or lessen the privileges of the House, but it had never yet claimed such a power as that now asked for—a power to disfranchise for an indefinite period a particular borough by its sole vote. They certainly had power to make new precedents and to change the Constitution of the country; but in this case the Judge under the law which they had made had reported under three distinct heads—namely, on the conduct of the candidates, on the conduct of the voters, and on the conduct of the constituency. The Judge had three times reported against the candidates and against the voters; but with reference to the constituency the Judge once nominally reported against it, but the House held that was not a valid Report, and on the last two elections the Judge had reported in favour of the constituency. The Judge had, therefore, twice acquitted the constituency of corruption, and yet the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry asked the House to act as if the Judge had found the constituency "Guilty." The hon. and learned Member said—"Although under the statute you cannot inquire, yet you may suspend." To him (Sir William Harcourt) this appeared a most extraordinary argument, whether it be regarded from the point of view of common law or of constitutional law. The object of the Election Petitions Act was precisely to prevent such discussions as the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry had raised to-night. It was intended to prevent that which was necessary when the decisions of Committees were unsatisfactory—namely, that matters upon which opinions differed very much should be discussed on the floor of the House. The Act was intended to give the House a verdict against the constituency of "Guilty" or "Not Guilty" on which it might act; and the express intention of the legislation was that the House of Commons should not be constituted into a jury to revise the decision of the Judge. Therefore, by carrying the present Motion the House would practically repeal the Election Petitions Act. If the House, ignoring the judicial decision, were to go into a discussion as to the facts of the case, he saw nothing before them but endless disputes. If hon. Members were to attempt to regulate the social arrangements of particular boroughs they would be undertaking a duty which they were little fitted to fulfil. What he could say on the subject would carry little weight; but before the discussion was brought to a close the House would doubtless hear the advice of the Prime Minister, which advice would greatly influence the decision of the House from the right hon. Gentleman's long Parliamentary experience as well as from the high office he filled. For his own part, he deprecated this dangerous innovation in Parliamentary practice—an innovation which shook the foundations upon which rested the rights of the constituencies. He hoped the House would not consent to the Motion; and, indeed, he trusted that, upon further consideration, the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry would not press it to a division.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, that he could quite have understood the object of the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry (Mr. C. Lewis) if he had moved for the suspension of the writ with a view to some ulterior proceeding; but the hon. and learned Gentleman distinctly and clearly stated that he did not move for the suspension of the writ with a view to any ulterior proceeding at all, but only for the purpose of inflicting some punishment—which he assumed had been deserved—on the constituency of Stroud. It appeared to him that the suspension of the writ for such a purpose as that would be contrary, not only to Parliamentary precedent, but also to the law, and certainly to policy. Why should the constituency of the borough of Stroud be punished for an offence of which they had not been found guilty? and why should they be punished when there was to be no investigation set on foot to discover whether they were guilty of an offence or not? As far as he could make out, the law of the matter was very clear and simple. Prior to the Act of 1854—under which a Commission might issue upon the application of both Houses of Parliament—no doubt writs were very frequently suspended; but a reference to the authorities on the subject showed that the writs were suspended in order that an investigation might be instituted for the purpose of ascertaining whether corrupt practices extensively prevailed, and with a view to the ultimate disfranchisement of the offending constituencies. Under the Act of Parliament in question, both Houses might petition Her Majesty to issue a Commission upon the Report of a Committee appointed to try an Election Petition that corrupt practices had extensively prevailed, or upon the Report of a Committee appointed to inquire whether corrupt practices had extensively prevailed in any particular place. But unless there was such a Report a Commission could not issue. By a subsequent Act the Election Judge was substituted for the Committee to try the Election Petition, and as the law now stood, a Commission could not issue unless there was a Report from the Election Judge that corrupt practices had extensively prevailed. No doubt, if

But unless there was such a Report a Commission could not issue. By a subsequent Act the Election Judge was substituted for the Committee to try the Election Petition, and as the law now stood, a Commission could not issue unless there was a Report from the Election Judge that corrupt practices had extensively prevailed. No doubt, if there were such a Report, or if there had been a Committee appointed to inquire whether corrupt practices prevailed, and such Committee had made a Report to that effect, a Commission could issue under the Act of Parliament; otherwise, it could not. Now, the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry wished the writ for Stroud to be suspended, although the Election Judge, instead of reporting that corrupt practices extensively prevailed, had reported distinctly to the contrary. The hon. and learned Member would have the House to ignore the finding of the learned Judge—that was, of the tribunal properly constituted and authorized to investigate the matter. In the teeth of that finding, which exculpated really and truly the constituents of Stroud, and was to the effect that they had not offended, the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry would have the House suspend the issuing of the writ for the purpose of punishing the constituents of Stroud for not having offended. He (the Solicitor General) objected to the Motion.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, he thought the argument of the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) was based on two fallacious principles. He was not going to enter into a controversy of precedents, although he thought the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry (Mr. C. Lewis) had carried off the victory, and had shown that the weight of precedents was on his side. The first of the false principles on which the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Oxford rested was that the franchise was a property and not a trust; and the second principle he laid down was distrust of the House of Commons. The first of these principles was a most dangerous one, for if it were sound a voter would be justified in selling his vote to the highest bidder. This point was thoroughly discussed at the time of the passage of the Reform Bill. It was on the same ground that the hon. and learned Gentleman spoke of punishment, saying that Stroud should be put in a corner like a naughty child, or rusticated like an undergraduate. He contended, however, that the House had a right to see that the trust of the franchise was properly fulfilled; and that, if it were abused, the House had a right to put the naughty child in a corner. In other words, disfranchisement was a proper punishment for a borough. The hon. and learned Gentleman's next argument was that a borough might be disfranchised, but not by the House of Commons. It must, according to him, be disfranchised by Act of Parliament. Now, what was the difference between a vote of the House of Commons and an Act of Parliament? The effect was two-fold. In the first place, an Act of Parliament involved the consent of the three Estates of the Realm, and not of the House of Commons alone; and for that reason it was the hon. and learned Gentleman expressed distrust of the House of Commons. The hon. and learned Gentleman said—"Remember the great abuses that may come in if you trust the House of Commons alone, without the Queen and the House of Lords to keep it in check." In fact, he spoke of the House of Commons as if it were the National Assembly or the Constituent Assembly of France in 1791. Then the hon. and learned Member cited a precedent which went strongly against him, for he alluded in a passing manner, as though he was afraid of it, to the Jewish Disabilities. That controversy was raging at the time he first entered the House. A Bill was brought in year after year, and it failed to be carried owing to the votes, not only of Members on that side of the House, but to the votes of many of the extreme Party on the other side, who voted against the measure on the ground that the House of Lords and the Crown had no right to meddle with the qualifications for seats in the House of Commons. They argued that the question whether Jews should sit in the Lower House was one for the boroughs and communes of England to decide, and that the House of Commons alone had a right to settle the matter. Consequently Lord Russell dealt with it by a separate Resolution, which was passed in the House of Commons. The other difference between an Act of Parliament and a Resolution of the House of Commons was, that one was more permanent than the other. If the Motion were passed, next Session the House might, in one evening, vote that the franchise should be given to Stroud; but an Act of Parliament would, in the shape of a Bill, occupy a Session, and have to run the gauntlet of both Houses. But that was the very objection his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Londonderry made. The fact that the franchise might be given back by a vote of the House was an argument in favour of the Motion. Again, the hon. and learned Gentleman said the Judge had reported in favour of the constituency, and that the House should act upon the Judge's opinion, who, having reported on case after case of bribery said, in a lenient mood, that the constituency were not guilty of bribery. Well, if the candidates were not guilty, and if the constituency were not — good Heavens! who were guilty of bribery? The Judge had given sentence, and on that sentence, said the hon. and learned Gentleman, the House were bound to act. If that were so, why did he not bring in a Bill to extend the Bill of the year before last? The hon. and learned Gentleman would practically leave the whole matter in the hands of the Judge; but the House of Commons had already declined to delegate such power to any Judge. The House retained that power in its own hands, and the hon. and learned Gentleman only showed a little more of his distrust in the House of Commons in the course he had that evening pursued. The Judge was still a Judge merely, and not a jury. The House of Commons was in such a case as the present both Judge and jury, and it was because he had no distrust in that House that he supported the Motion.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON said, he had risen some time since to support the Motion, but at the same time his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) happened to catch the Speaker's eye. He was very glad he had the benefit of his hon. and learned Friend's speech before he made his own; because, although he felt inclined half-an-hour ago to vote for the Motion, he was perfectly convinced he should do so, having heard the speech of his hon. and learned Friend. That speech was nothing, from beginning to end, than precedent, precedent, precedent. He (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) said—“Away with musty precedents.” What did the House of Commons exist for but to make precedents? and he hoped they would make a new precedent that night. Talk about the Motion being unconstitutional, and beyond the powers of the House of Commons! It was nothing of the kind. If there were anything irregular or wrong in it, the Speaker would not have allowed it to appear on the Order Book that day. Let them take a broader view of the question than was usually taken by Gentlemen of the long robe. What was the object in moving for the issue of the writ? There could be only two objects in view—to remove a grievance which was felt in Stroud by the electors of that wonderful borough, or to remove a public grievance which was felt by the House of Commons and the country. He had no doubt that inconvenience and discontent were felt by a certain section of the Stroud constituency. They were very fond of elections there, and the persons who delighted in them, and made most profit by them, had had four elections in seven months, which he thought was quite enough, and ought to satisfy anyone. But there might be other reasons why this writ was moved. His hon. and learned Friend the Member for Oxford talked about street gossip, which alluded to certain arrangements which had been made with regard to the election at Stroud. Now, he would give his hon. and learned Friend, not street gossip, but two or three lines which appeared that morning in the leading journal. That at all events was not street gossip. He read The Times, and very able and well-informed people wrote for The Times. Here was the statement—

“We have much pleasure in stating that arrangements are in progress, by which it is hoped that the Right Hon. E. P. Bouverie may be returned without a contest for the seat vacated at Stroud by the last decision of the Election Petition Judge. Liberals and Conservatives alike will rejoice to have Mr. Bouverie once more in the House of Commons.”

They all had a great regard for his right hon. Friend, who had been removed from the House of Commons for about 12 months; but he must say he never heard anything so bad of him as that he was to be supported by both Conservatives and Liberals. But if that were the case, what was the grievance at Stroud? If they really meant to bring in his right hon. Friend—[“No, no!”]—well, he thought it very probable. They had one Member now, a very good allowance as times go, for a town of 38,000 people such as they were. If they now returned a Member who would vote Liberal and Conservative, what would they gain in voting power? They had, therefore, no real grievance; but perhaps they were to regard the question as involving some grievance to the public. For his part, he was inclined to think the House was large enough, and that they could do perfectly well without an additional Member, especially at a time when there was so little to do for any one of them. He would put the question impartially to both sides, and first he would say a word to hon. Gentlemen opposite. Last year they were told by the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Salt)—a consistent, straightforward, able supporter of the Ministerial party—that that party were a party of silence and consideration. Now, he asked them, if Mr. Bouverie were in the House, could they be silent or considerate? Again, let them look at the Liberal side of the House. They were certainly in a better position than they were in a short time ago, having been last Wednesday consolidated in the Smoking Room of the Reform Club. And, as he understood from the Leaders of the party, their duty at the present moment was to do nothing but sit and watch hon. Gentlemen opposite. But if they got Mr. Bouverie into the House, he would so disturb them that they could not possibly perform that duty. Whatever they did, let them not get a clever man into the House. If Mr. Bouverie got in he would have something to say upon every subject, and the Party which had just been consolidated would fall to pieces like a pack of cards. Let them wait until there was some great question before the country, when Mr. Bouverie might come in, not, perhaps, supported by both parties, but by one party—he should not like to say which. Let them not, for Mr. Bouverie's sake, if it were so—still less for the sake of keeping up old musty precedents, in which his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Oxford delighted—throw the whole town of Stroud into turmoil and confusion, for no good purpose that he could see. Let them wait, at all events. Let Mr. Bouverie wait, and come in at some other time, not at this moment, to disturb the holy calm and profound peace that at present pervaded every section and fraction of a section of the House of Commons.

Mr. WHITBREAD said, that having been connected with the general Committee on Elections, and having cordially supported the measure brought in by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli), which handed over Election Petitions to the Judges, he was unwilling to give a silent vote on this question. In his opinion, the position of those who had opposed this Motion was, so far as precedent and principle was concerned, entirely unassailable. They were told that this writ ought not to issue because political excitement ran high at Stroud. They were now asked to make a new crime and a new offence. They were told the borough of Stroud had got into such a state of political excitement, that it was not likely to exercise the franchise properly, and the House was accordingly asked to take a most dangerous step in creating a new precedent on the subject. He appealed to the Prime Minister who brought in this Act to support the authority of the Judges. The law provided for the appointment of a Commission in cases only in which corrupt practices were reported to have extensively prevailed. It seemed to him that they would be taking a new course in refusing upon their own responsibility to issue a writ; and if they once adopted that principle, there was no limit beyond which they might not carry it. The hon. Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) would have them disregard precedents; but for himself, after many years' experience in the House, he could hardly remember a case where a precedent had been disregarded of which they did not soon have occasion to repent. He sincerely hoped that the House would not accept the advice given to it, and begin an era of new precedents. Whatever the vote might be, he entered his protest against any such course being adopted.

Mr. GREGORY contended that the fact that the House was the authority to issue a writ was a presumption that it possessed jurisdiction in a case of this kind, and they were called upon to exercise a kind of judicial function in issuing such writ. It was true that the Judge exonerated the borough of Stroud from a general charge of corruption; but his words were very guarded, being that there was no reason to think that general corruption had prevailed "in the present election." Knowing what the House did of the previous elections for the borough, it could appreciate such a finding on this occasion. The true issue now raised was that there had been four elections, every one of which had been more or less tainted by corruption. Yet the House was now called upon to exonerate the borough from all criminality, and to issue the writ as if the borough was one of the purest in England. He could not consent to take such a course, and he would, therefore, support the Motion of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Londonderry (Mr. C. Lewis).

MR. DISRAELI: Mr. Speaker, my hon. Friend who has just addressed us stated that he would try to put the question before the House in its true light. I will endeavour also to put the question before the House in its true light, and the light in which I view it is, that if this Motion is carried, it amounts to an abrogation of the Election Petitions Act of 1868. In that Act there were certain powers given to the Judges which the House of Commons waived, after ample discussion, after great thought, and with a due sense of the sacrifices they were making. If we were now to announce that because the decision of a Judge, acting under such authority, does not please us, we are to come to a decision contrary to that which according to the provisions of the law has been made public by him, I can only look upon it that if this Motion were carried, the authority of that Act would be entirely superseded. I am not prepared, however, in any way to supersede or abrogate that Act. I believe that it has worked well for the country and for the House of Commons. It is possible that in some of its details it may be improved—and that is a point on which it is unnecessary to enlarge—but the general spirit of that Act is good, and it will be well for the House of Commons always to support it. The hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) who always addresses us in a spirit of gay wisdom, laughs at experience and denounces precedents. Well, precedents are often attacked and abused, and the hon. Baronet to-night has been profuse in his denunciations of them. But precedents generally—and I will say Parliamentary precedents always—embalm principles; and I am convinced that if we remove far from the line which our Parliamentary precedents indicate to us for our guidance and the conduct of our business, we shall soon repent our rash-ness. The noble Lord the Member for the county of Westmeath (Lord Robert Montagu) sent me a pamphlet the other day, which I have read with much interest—as I read everything that comes from his animated pen. It was a vindication of Infallibility. In what quarter that infallibility is exercised it is unnecessary for me to touch upon, but to-night my noble Friend is the champion of the infallibility of the House of Commons. That is a principle which, to my mind, is certainly not orthodox, neither is it always safe. I have sat in this House as long, probably, as most men now in it, and I am deeply interested in its honour and reputation; but I have ever opposed any proposal that this House should assert to itself an authority independent of the other branches of the Legislature, and estates of the realm. The proposal before us, however, essentially aims at such a consequence. My hon. Friend who made this Motion would do well, I think, if he were to consider what course he will adopt if he succeeds. If he carries it, he cannot terminate his connection with the borough of Stroud. He will by the success of his Motion appoint himself the guardian of the honour and interests of the borough. He must be perpetually bringing the subject before the House, and it will be for him, when he has made due inquiry, to tell us when he thinks that the borough of Stroud has returned to that order of mind at which we may entrust to it the noblest franchise of Englishmen. He must keep us au courant with a series of bulletins about the state of the borough of Stroud, because he has no ulterior plan. The proposition itself is one which, if it succeeds to-night, holds out to the House no promise or prospect of any future arrangement; and therefore I think my hon. Friend will find great difficulty in the course which he has adopted. He cannot, if he wishes really to punish the electors of Stroud; he cannot, if he succeeds in his Motion to-night, call upon the other authorities of the Legislature to combine with him and bind the House of Commons to carry any measure on the subject. He cuts himself off from any constitutional course becoming the occasion by the line he is pursuing to-night. My hon. Friend will do well then to consider these difficulties before he calls upon the House to come to a vote upon this question,

The times may come when the spirit of the House of Commons may be very different from what it is at present. I can remember myself some periods since I have been a Member of this House, when the existence of the Government depended upon a single vote—when the country was inflamed on subjects which were peculiarly adapted to excite the passions of a free people, and when things were proposed which those who had any connection with them may look back upon with regret. What saved the House of Commons at that time? What saved it from a course which might produce Parliamentary anarchy and inflict great injury on the country generally? Why, it was respect for the musty precedents which the hon. Baronet holds up to humorous scorn to-night that guided them. There were then great men in Parliament on both sides of the House. There were lawyers—although he sneers at gentlemen of the long robe—who were never equalled probably at any period of our Parliamentary history for their learning and independence, and experienced statesmen on both sides, who agreed that they would adhere to precedents and be guided by the experience of their predecessors. I trust the House, then, will not allow itself to deviate into a path so dangerous and so difficult as the one that has been indicated, and which we have been recommended to pursue to-night. I am sure if we do, we shall open up a scene of confusion which will not easily end, and no question of a Parliamentary contest will ever come before the House without some proposition being made so unconstitutional in its character that the result must be the degradation of the authority of Parliament, and the reduction of our powers of being useful to the country.

Mr. CHARLES LEWIS said, he was compelled to say a few words on account of the way in which the Motion had been met by the two front benches. He understood the proposition which was now laid down to be that, under no circumstances had that House the power to suspend the issue of a writ for any constituency when there was a vacancy, unless there was a case for a Commission upon the Election Report of a Judge, and that the House could take no other step for the punishment of a borough found guilty of great, though not of extensive, bribery. If so, what was the meaning of the form of asking the House, aye or no, whether it would consent to the issue of a writ? What was the meaning of that indignation which came from the front benches on the other side when, in the case of Wakefield last year, it was found that the writ had been moved for the same night? The other side of the House expressed its indignation at being taken by surprise. How could it be taken by surprise if, in the absence of a case for a Commission by reason of the form of the Judge's Report, the issue of a writ was a matter of right, and not a matter of discretion? What was the meaning of the formality the House was asked to go through yesterday by the Secretary to the Treasury, in passing a Resolution, that in any case where a vacancy had been occasioned by a Report imputing bribery, no writ should be issued, except after two days' notice on the Votes? That must have been proposed under a fallacious assumption if, as was now stated on the highest authority, the House had no discretion, unless there was a case for a Commission. It was he who was asking the House to follow its own precedents. The appeal of the hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir William Harcourt) to the precedent of Stafford failed for its purpose and strengthened his own case. It was not for bribery committed at an election during the existing Parliament, but for bribery committed during an antecedent Parliament, not followed by disfranchisement, that the House interposed for two years to prevent an election; and it was not even a by-election, but a vacancy occasioned by a resignation. Neither front bench had attempted to meet that precedent, and when the hon. and learned Gentleman did refer to it, he found he was dealing with what was said in 1833, when the Report of the Committee had just been presented, and had given the go-by to the accumulated force of the subsequent facts and the suspension of the writ by another Parliament from 1835 to 1837. Neither the hon. and learned Gentleman, nor the Solicitor General, nor the Prime Minister said anything about Wakefield. In that case, when the Commission had spent its force, when it was functus officio, when no hon. Member of the House ventured to say there was a case to justify disfranchisement, when there was no proposition to deal with the borough in any other form, the House refused for two whole years after the Report of the Commission was laid on the Table to issue a writ for the election of a Member. He was held up as an intruder upon ancient precedents; but, as he had said, he asked the House to follow its own precedents, not to fly in the face of them and tear them up—he left it to the two front benches to do that, remembering that, when they agreed, they were generally in the wrong. He asked the independent Members to maintain the forms, customs, and precedents of Parliament for the purpose of putting down corruption, and not to allow themselves to be led away by the suggestions which had been made. This case would be a dividing line in the history of Parliament if, by the junction of the two sides above the Gangway, the Motion was defeated, and the inference would be deduced that unless the case of corruption was so bad as to come within the purview of a Commission, no amount of subsidiary or detailed corruption would be sufficient to render it liable to a day's punishment. Under those circumstances, he must persist in dividing the House.

MR. CHILDERS was unwilling to intrude on the House after the reply of the hon. Member; but, as he had again referred to the precedent of Stafford, he wished to say that at the election of 1833 it was notorious that there was great corruption, and, as the ordinary forms of inquiry would not reach the case, an Act was passed for a special Committee. The corruption was proved, and in the following Session a Bill was introduced to disfranchise Stafford; but the Bill failed to reach the House of Lords in time to be passed. In 1835 it was again introduced and carried by an enormous majority in the Commons, but it again failed to pass the Lords. In 1836 it was introduced for the third time and carried by the consent of almost the whole House, but it was rejected by the Lords; and when it had been rejected, a writ was moved for, so that the precedent, instead of supporting the hon. and learned Member, told the other way.

LIGHTING, PAVING, AND CLEANSING (METROPOLIS).—RESOLUTION.

SIR WILLIAM FRASER, in rising to move—

“That, in the opinion of this House, the condition of the Metropolis as regards Lighting, Paving, and Cleansing, calls for legislation,” said, that the question was whether the Metropolis should continue in its present condition of sordid anarchy with respect to those important matters. The last time he called attention to the subject, some years ago, he moved the appointment of a Royal Commission to investigate and report upon the condition of London, but Sir George Grey, then Secretary of State, declined to accede to the Motion, on the ground that the facts were already well known, and there would be no advantage in issuing a Royal Commission on the subject. In the autumn of the same year Sir George Grey wrote a letter to the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works, calling attention to the debate and asking their opinion upon it. The question was fully discussed by the Metropolitan Board, and the conclusion to which they came, as might have been anticipated, expressed their high approval of the state of London, and the opinion that no reform was necessary. A Select Committee was subsequently moved for by the late Mr. Charles Buxton, which was consented to, and presided over by a right hon. Gentleman of great ability (Mr. Ayrton), then Member for the Tower Hamlets, a Member of the late Government, the result of which was to add two bulky and interesting volumes to the literature which already existed on the subject. There was a long Report with the Minutes of Evidence, but nothing came of it until last autumn, when a deputation waited on the Home Secretary. He (Sir William Fraser) was requested to take part in it, but he declined to do so, promising, however, to give his best attention to the Bill which was then foreshadowed. The facts of the case could hardly be disputed. The vestries of London, under whom we lived, and by whom we were ruled, had numerous advocates in the House, and if he was thought a foeman worthy of their steel, there would be an ample opportunity for defence. It was well known that they were most inefficient in their management of the local affairs of the metropolis; that they were a numerous and divided body, incapable of doing anything effectively; and it was to remedy the present state of things and to bring public opinion to bear upon the question that he brought forward his Motion. First of all, could anyone say that the paving of London was in a satisfactory condition? Taking on the one hand an aristocratic thoroughfare, and on the other, one inhabited by the humblest classes, he would submit to the House whether they indicated a state of things that ought to exist. He would not go as far as Bermondsey; but, taking Piccadilly, which had been paved in the most various ways; he did not know whether there had been asphalt, but there had been wood, granite, macadam; could it be said that its paving was such as it ought to be, or that it was managed so as to render walking as convenient and practicable as possible? At that very moment the inhabitants of Piccadilly, including a Royal Prince, were indebted to the charity of a private individual, who was permitted at a large expense to himself to assist in putting down a wooden pavement. Had there been an uniform system of administration uniformity of pavement would have been brought about. In Oxford Street and other great thoroughfares there was great variety, and in the smaller thoroughfares the variety was, if possible, still greater. How was the work carried out? When an accident occurred on a railway, men were set to work morning, noon, and night, to clear the line. But what happened in London when the pavement was being replaced? Men went to work, left off to go to dinner, and when dusk came not a man was to be found doing anything, though the traffic in London was a hundred times greater than on the most frequented railway. There was scarcely a day passed that they might not read in the newspapers accounts of accidents occurring in the streets, resulting in broken or dislocated limbs; and as for the roads in what were called "the outskirts," you might travel into any part of the Kingdom without finding worse. As an instance, the Queen's Road, near the Chelsea Suspension Bridge might be taken, and it would be found that it was periodically full of mud, slush, or dust, varied occasionally by masses of flint, which were thrown in the roadway and left there unrolled. Then the street gas was very bad, so he was informed; and when he visited any other town he found it to be better. They paid the best price, and yet they got an indifferent article; and if they complained about it the companies, who possessed great capital, would turn round and say—"Do your worst." In fact, they laughed at the remonstrances of the vestries; while as to the lamp-posts, many of them appeared to form part of an old stock accumulated in the reign of one of the Georges, which was now being gradually used up. Thirdly, with regard to cleansing, could anything be worse? In the summer there was constant dust, in the winter mud and slush, followed by granite, flints, and every sort of ingredients. And not only that, but we were told that a great many of the worst disorders, those called entozoic, were caused by decayed particles of matter carried about. As for the question of snow, which at times was wont to agitate the newspapers, we know that vast masses of it were allowed to accumulate, as some thought, quite unnecessarily. It might be very difficult to remove quickly a heavy fall, but there were other means of getting rid of snow, which surely might be tried; for instance, it might possibly be melted by heated rollers. One great difficulty in dealing with London was its vast extent; but, besides, it was completely different from every other city. One of the most interesting discoveries of the present generation was the unearthing of the vast sites of ancient cities, such as Babylon and Nineveh, situated on what was once, and might again become, the great highway of the world. Those cities were built with far more regard to sanitary conditions than London. For instance, instead of being wedged together as with us, every house had its garden, and he need not dwell on the salubrious effect of such an arrangement. The vestries were very much blamed for the state of things of which he complained: no doubt the main point was that these bodies were far too weak. It was easy to bring accusations of venality, and to say that no persons went to a vestry except for corrupt purposes. He did not share that opinion. These men might do their best; but their best was not at all good. In the last century, a philosopher who cared, perhaps, more for point and

He would not say that, but he would say that “whate’er is worst administered is worst;” there could be nothing worse than the administration of London. Nor were the different Acts of Parliament governing these bodies by any means strong enough. Many of the clauses of Sir Benjamin Hall’s Act began with the word “may.” “The vestry may do this or that;” the word “shall” ought to have been substituted. Several different schemes for the government of London had been suggested, to all of which, of course, objections might be urged. One was that London should be formed into a vast corporation with the City for a centre; but it was probable that the City, being very rich, would not care to amalgamate itself with another corporation, which was not only very poor, but was burdened with a heavy and increasing debt. Another scheme was to form each of the Parliamentary boroughs into a corporation; but he feared if that were done, the men who served in those corporations would not be much more enlightened than the present vestrymen. He believed there was a considerable jealousy of London, and a desire in many quarters that it should continue weak, and broken up into opposing bodies that it might not become a rival to Parliament. It had occurred to him, therefore, that it might be brought more directly under the control of that House if a Minister were appointed for London, aided by an elected Board, which should have the necessary taxing powers in regard to the three great essentials he had named. Were that done, he felt sure that there would be one great sigh of relief from all the ratepayers of London. He did not ask for immediate legislation, but he hoped that something would be done soon. It was necessary to bring public opinion to bear on the matter, and it was in the hope of doing something towards that end, and towards arousing a feeling on the subject, that he had brought forward the Motion. The hon. Baronet concluded by moving his Resolution.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That, in the opinion of this House, the condition of the Metropolis as regards Lighting, Paving, and Cleansing, calls for legislation.”—

(Sir William Fraser.)

SIR JAMES HOGG said, that though the Metropolitan Board, of which he had the honour to be Chairman, had nothing to do with paving or lighting, yet he felt it his duty to make a few remarks on those subjects. In doing so, he would at once say, he could take little exception to the manner in which the Motion had been brought forward. He did not intend, on this occasion, to enter into a detailed defence of the government of London, because that was not the question involved in the Motion, and it would probably come before the House at some future time. In his opinion, after having given considerable attention to the paving, cleansing, and lighting of the metropolis, he thought that, on the whole, though there might be some cause of complaint, these things were fairly done, considering that there were 1,200 miles of streets to attend to, and an area of 120 square miles. Speaking, not, like his hon. Friend, as a gentleman of leisure, rather fond of criticism, but as Chairman of the Metropolitan Board, and also as having previously served on local vestries and district boards, he could assure the House that a vast amount of care and attention was given to the work, and he thought that, speaking generally, the governing bodies deserved praise rather than the reverse. Considering, too, that his hon. Friend had had since August last to prepare his indictment against the vestries and district boards, he thought the case just presented to the House was rather a meagre one. His hon. Friend mentioned the paving of Piccadilly; but had he ever considered that the gradients of Piccadilly were not the same throughout the whole length, and that it was impossible to put asphalt on a hill, or horses would tumble down? Then his hon. Friend said, that if London were under a single government, there would be one uniform paving. Now, he did hope the day would never arrive when there would be one uniform system throughout the whole metropolis. Where there was a vast amount of traffic, pitching was absolutely necessary; while in other places, gravel would suffice. He was glad to see that wood pavement was being laid down in various places. It had formerly been tried and failed, but he hoped it would prove successful now. Local boards, however, would be blamed if they spent a great deal of money upon experimental pavements, though they were quite ready to adopt them on a larger scale if they proved successful. As to lighting, he should not say much. It would be his duty by and by to introduce Bills, asking the House to assist him in purchasing or regulating the gas undertakings of the metropolis, and he should expect the cordial support of his hon. Friend in that endeavour. Meanwhile, if the gas companies put bad gas into the public lamps, his hon. Friend must not blame the vestries. In justice to the companies whose gas had to be tested by the Metropolitan Board, he was bound to say that the gas was generally found to be up to the mark when thus tested; but, in any case, the vestries and district boards were not responsible if the gas were not of the best character. The cost of lighting in one or two parishes would show how considerable this item of local expenditure was, and that the vestries had not fallen short of their duty in that respect. In St. Pancras, the lighting cost £15,428; in St. George's, Hanover Square, £11,498; and in St. Marylebone, £17,368; while the paving in Marylebone cost £17,399; in St. George's, Hanover Square, £20,281; and in St. Pancras, £38,947. The vestries were, therefore, alive to their duties, and felt that they were bound to spend large sums of money in this way. Surely, however, there must be some limit to this expenditure. Vestries could not go on increasing the rates indefinitely. The rates even now ranged from 3s. 6d. up to 6s. or 7s. in some cases; and he had often had to vote with a sad heart, when appeals were made by poor people, ill able to bear the rates. It was the duty of the persons who controlled these funds, to use them in the most economical manner. As regarded cleansing, he agreed that it was of importance, in the interests of public health, to do as much as possible in removing the summer dust and the winter mud; but in a changeable climate like ours, sometimes even the best intentions must be baffled by the state of the weather. One or two facts respecting the expenditure for cleansing the streets would, perhaps, astonish the House. In

1874, this item amounted in Marylebone to £12,262, and 129 men were employed daily. In St. George's, Hanover Square, it cost £9,242, with 80 or 90 men employed; and in Westminster, it cost £7,600. The vestry which had the charge of Regent Street, employed gangs of men, who began their work at 4 o'clock, both in summer and winter, and in other parts of London, the men began work at 5 o'clock, so that the larger thoroughfares might be cleansed at a proper time without impeding the traffic. The snow was always a matter of complaint, but it was impossible to gather up at once a large mass of snow. During the last fall of snow, 600 men were employed in the parish of St. George's Hanover Square, at a cost of £400; and general instructions were given to the surveyor that whenever a fall of snow occurred, he had carte blanche to do what was necessary. According to an estimate which had been prepared by the surveyor of St. George's Vestry, it would take the same amount of labour of men and horses to clear the streets from six inches of snow, as would suffice to cleanse them for a whole twelvemonth. The same might be said for both Marylebone and St. Pancras. That estimate would show the House what enormous difficulty was occasioned by a deep fall of snow in the metropolis. One of the chief difficulties in connection with the subject was to find a shoot for the snow. Carts, and men to put the snow into them, might be hired, but what was to be done with the snow when it was in the carts? and that was a difficulty that increased year by year, the carts having to go further and further to find a shoot. The cost of watering the roads, again, was probably, on the average, £90 per mile. The hon. Baronet had charged the vestries and district boards with having been wanting in their duty; but he begged to lay the following figures before the House, compiled from a return from most of the vestries and district boards, showing what had been done in these respects during the last 19 years in which the Metropolitan Board had been in existence. The parish of St. Mary, Islington, had laid down 541,363 square yards of paving, at a cost of £105,278, and had put up 1,246 lamps. The parish of St. Leonard's, Shoreditch, had laid down

501,645 square yards of paving, at a cost of £119,094, and had put up 70 lamps. The parish of Bethnal Green had laid down 364,629 square yards of paving, at a cost of £104,300. The parish of Kensington had laid down 149,000 yards of paving, at a cost of £113,963, and had added 2,275 lamps. All the districts had not sent in returns, but the returns that had been furnished showed that in parts of the metropolis, 4,871,501 square yards of paving had been laid down, at a cost of £2,079,880, and that 14,440 lamps had been put up during the period to which he had referred. Under these circumstances, he thought that the much-abused vestries and district boards of the metropolis were entitled to some little credit, at all events, for what they had done in this direction. He should state, in conclusion, that the Metropolitan Board had no control over this matter, and could only notify deficiencies to the vestries and district boards, with a view to their correction.

MR. BECKETT-DENISON said, he wished to bear his testimony to the deplorable state in which many of the thoroughfares of the metropolis were allowed to remain on Sundays. To whatever cause it was due, they were left wholly uncleansed and unwatered, so that London, on a Sunday, when there was a high wind prevailing, was simply insufferable. No doubt a great many of the vestries were entitled to commendation for the way in which they looked after the interests of their parishes; but there were others of which the same thing could not be said, and a discussion like the present would be very useful in arousing them to a sense of their duties. At the same time, he felt that it was scarcely right, seeing how high the parochial rates were, to ask the vestries to increase the burdens of the ratepayers.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, that no man was better entitled to speak upon the subject than the hon. Baronet who had introduced it to the notice of the House, he having called attention to it years ago, when Sir George Grey, who was then Home Secretary, promised to take the matter into the consideration of the Government; and he had much ground for complaint when, after the lapse of so many years, he found that the streets of the metropolis were in the same state as when he first drew attention to the subject. The hon. Baronet had placed the matter very ably before the House; but he had made one rather important omission in his speech, and that was to show how the evil he pointed out was to be cured. He trusted that the hon. Baronet would go a step further, and would embody his views in the shape of a practical Bill, when his proposals might be more easily discussed. He had also listened with much attention to what had fallen from the hon. Member who had spoken in defence of the vestries. He was not about to enter on the present occasion into the question of how far the vestries had carried out what was entrusted to them, or how far they had failed to do so; for, judging from what had been stated that night, he would have ample opportunities at another period of the Session of going further into this matter. But his hon. Friend the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board had said a great deal about cost and very little about science. Now, he (Mr. Cross) could not help thinking that by the application of scientific knowledge, much greater results than any that had yet been attained might have been effected at a much less cost in lighting, cleansing, and paving. What was wanted was some mode of applying scientific knowledge, and any private Member who brought forward a proposal of this kind, which would affect the whole of the metropolis, should be very careful that his plan should provide for the greatest convenience to the public at the least possible cost, and this could only be secured by applying scientific knowledge to the subject. A good deal had been said about the clearing away of the snow after a heavy snow-storm, and he had received numbers of letters complaining of him for not taking steps to secure its removal, and also for not seeing that the crossings were swept and the pavements prevented from becoming greasy; but he wished to take that opportunity of replying to those persons en masse, and to remind them that it was the duty of every householder in London to see that the pavement in front of his premises was swept and cleaned. He knew that this was enforced during the prevalence of snow, but it was not strictly enforced at other times. He trusted that, after the discussion which had been evoked, the hon. Baronet would not deem it necessary to go to a division on his Resolution, but would withdraw it.

SIR WILLIAM FRASER said, he was willing to accede to the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman. He must still however maintain that men who were entrusted, as vestrymen were, with the disposal of vast sums of money ought to be the very best men that could be got. The right hon. Gentleman had suggested that he (Sir William Fraser) ought to bring in a Bill. He had purposely avoided that course, for it could not be expected that a non-official Member would be able to carry a comprehensive measure on such a subject. He had confined himself to making a suggestion, which he still thought was not an unsound one, namely, that there should be a Board consisting of a limited number of persons, and presided over by a Minister of high rank. In a letter which appeared last autumn in The Times, Lord Grey suggested that a Committee of the Privy Council should be appointed to consider this question. But, surely there was a Committee of the Privy Council sitting en permanence, and receiving high, though not too high, emoluments, by whom the matter might very properly be considered. He hoped the present debate would be the means of attracting general attention to the subject, and that he would live long enough to see London very different from what it now was in the respects to which he had referred.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—OPPOSED BUSINESS.

RESOLUTION.

MR. HEYGATE, in rising to move the following Resolution:—

“That, except for a Money Bill, no Order of the Day or Notice of Motion be taken after half-past twelve of the clock at night, with respect to which Order or Notice of Motion a Notice of Opposition or Amendment shall have been printed on the Notice Paper, or if such Notice of Motion shall only have been given the next previous day of sitting, and objection shall be taken when such Notice is called,”

said, it was identical, in every respect, with one which obtained the sanction of the House in the Sessions of 1872 and 1873, and which received its form principally at the hands of the late Prime Minister. Last year he (Mr. Heygate) proposed its re-adoption, and it was carried, but with an addition suggested by the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn), who, it appeared, was going to bring forward a similar Amendment on the present occasion. That addition, in his (Mr. Heygate's) opinion, interfered very seriously with the salutary operation of the Resolution, and he trusted the hon. Member would be induced to alter his determination. It was not necessary to repeat the history of the circumstances which led the House to adopt in 1872, the Rule which he now again proposed. He would only remark that, previous to 1871, the uncertainty experienced, especially towards the end of the summer, as to what business might or might not occupy the attention of the House at a late hour, and the unseemly contention which sometimes resulted from the attempts made by hon. Members to force forward at an advanced period of the night, Bills of an important character, which encountered serious opposition, had pressed themselves more and more upon the attention of statesmen, and had, in fact, rendered it necessary that something should be done to remedy the evil and remove the scandal. Night after night hon. Members had to tramp incessantly through the Lobby, on divisions alternately for an adjournment of the House and for an adjournment of the debate, with the object of putting off Motions, the discussion of which could not properly be commenced at a very late hour. This state of things led to the appointment of a Committee, which sat in 1871, and considered the question very carefully. That Committee, which was composed of men of all parties, and included the Members who were admittedly best acquainted with the Business of the House, came to a conclusion which went a great deal further than the Resolution now submitted. By 15 votes against 4, it recommended that no fresh Opposed Business should be proceeded with after half-past 12 o'clock. The four dissentients differed from the other Members in so far only that they desired to make the hour 1, instead of half-past 12. At the instance of the late Prime Minister, the Resolution proposed by the Committee was modified, when it came to be discussed in the House of Commons, to the extent of exempting from its operation all Money Bills, and of restricting its application to cases where Notice of opposition had been given in the Notice Paper. In that form, the Resolution was, in 1872, unanimously carried, and it worked exceedingly well. The following Session it was again adopted, this time not unanimously, but by 191 votes against 37. Last Session, on its being submitted for the third time, the hon. Member for Swansea, as he had before observed, succeeded in engrafting upon it an Amendment, exempting from its operation all Bills which had passed through Committee. Perhaps many hon. Members were hardly aware of the effect of that alteration. Whereas the Resolution in its former form put a stop to the commencement of discussion of opposed Bills after half-past 12 o'clock at four stages—namely, Second Reading, going into Committee, Third Reading, and Report—it now had that effect at two stages only. He was quite unable to understand on what principle the alteration was based. If there was any reason whatever for preventing fresh Opposed Business from being entered into after half-past 12, it was applicable as much at any one of the stages to which he had referred as at the others. No one could say that the Third Reading and the Report were unimportant stages. He would not detain the House further in proposing a Resolution which he had every reason to hope would be assented to. The practice of going on with new opposed legislation after half-past 12 at night was inconsistent with common sense, with the health of Members, and with the dignity of their proceedings. Practically, nothing that was said in the House after that hour was reported. It was no fault of the gentlemen who so well did their work in the gallery above that it was so, for it was well known that the newspapers had to be printed at an early hour of the morning, in order that they might be circulated all over the country. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving his Resolution.

MR. GOLDSMID said, he felt much pleasure in cordially seconding the Motion of his hon. Friend opposite, as he did last year. In the last Parliament they had seen what confusion prevailed when 40 or 50 Orders stood on the Business Paper, and hon. Members did not know which of them would be proceeded with. The difficulty was felt to be so great that the House was compelled to adopt the Resolution which his hon. Friend had moved that night. The relief thus given enabled hon. Members not only to obtain a moderate amount of sleep, but spared them the necessity of having to take part in those unsatisfactory and even unseemly proceedings which many of them remembered to have occurred night after night. He was sure that the divisions which had been taken at the small hours of the morning, not in twos or threes, but in eights or tens, or more, did not conduce to the respect due to their deliberations, while the legislation passed by hon. and weary Members after half-past 12 could hardly be well-considered, or be likely to prove beneficial to the country. It would, therefore, contribute to the order as well as to the usefulness of their proceedings if they adopted a rule which had been found necessary and which had worked well. The form in which his hon. Friend had proposed the Resolution was the best one for the House to adopt, for the simple reason that they all knew many blots in a Bill often had to be corrected after it came out of Committee and when it was being considered on the Report. He believed that these words, which fell from the late Speaker, were well deserving of the attention of the House—namely—“It is better that there should be free discussion on all the subjects brought before this House than that there should be rapid legislation;” and he was satisfied that free discussion, fairly reported by the Press, would produce better results for the country than any amount of sleepy legislation after half-past 12 o'clock. He felt sure that if Members of the present Parliament could have seen what took place in the last Parliament they would cordially adopt the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That, except for a Money Bill, no Order of the Day or Notice of Motion be taken after half-past twelve of the clock at night, with respect to which Order or Notice of Motion a Notice of Opposition or Amendment shall have been printed on the Notice Paper, or if such Notice of Motion shall only have been given the next previous day of sitting, and objection shall be taken when such Notice is called.”—(Mr. Heygate.)

MR. DILLWYN said, his hon. Friend said the only effect of the rule as to the Business of the House which he had moved would be to stop, if the House thought proper, the taking up of any new Business after half-past 12 o'clock. It would, he (Mr. Dillwyn) believed, do more than that; it would give to any hon. Member who was opposed to a Bill the power to prevent its further progress by simply giving Notice of a Motion against it upon the Paper. In one point he agreed with the Resolution—he did not think that new Business should be taken after half-past 12 o'clock; but when a Bill had made a certain amount of progress, and when the House had endorsed its principle, it might to a certain extent be considered the property of the House, and he did not think that any hon. Member should have the power to stop its further progress, as the Motion would do. If they adopted such a rule, they would have to sit later in the year. He now proposed to add to the Resolution the rider adopted last year—"Provided that this rule shall not apply to any Bill which has passed through Committee of the House," and his wish in making such a proposition was to get the whole of the business of the country done in a satisfactory manner; while, on the other hand, if the Resolution were passed in the form proposed the Business would, he thought, be carried out in a far from satisfactory manner. He last year, with the concurrence, and he might almost say the suggestion of the Prime Minister, had succeeded in carrying that rider, and it had, he believed, worked highly satisfactory, and therefore he trusted it would still remain on the Orders of the House. With that object in view, he begged to move the Amendment of which he had given Notice. If some such restrictions were not adopted this year, the result, he was afraid, would be that the House would be compelled to sit until September instead of adjourning in August, as he for one desired to do.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID said, he seconded the Amendment, as being necessary to give private Members a fair chance of proceeding with measures which they had introduced into the House. He disclaimed having any personal interest in the matter, because not having had the honour of a seat in the House until after the age of 50, he had from the first determined not to embark in so arduous an enterprise as that of bringing forward any Bill. But although he did not belong to the class he could see their hardships, and he wished to ask in what position would the proposal of the hon. Member for Leicestershire (Mr. Heygate) place those Members without the addition suggested by his hon. Friend? Even when the Bills of such Members had struggled against long odds through all the previous stages and passed through Committee, it would be in the power of any hon. Member to prevent the passing of the Bill by simply placing a Notice of opposition on the Paper. The whole of the previous labour and consideration might in that way at the close of the Session be thrown away. He hoped the addition would be agreed to.

Amendment proposed,

To add, at the end of the Question, the words "Provided that this rule shall not apply to any Bill which has passed through Committee of the House."—(Mr. Dillwyn.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, the hon. and learned Baronet the Member for Reading (Sir Francis Goldsmid) had appealed to the House as if the proposal of the hon. Member for Leicestershire (Mr. Heygate) was an innovation. The fact was that the proposition of the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) was the innovation, considering that the original proposition had been carried by both sides of the House, and acted upon for several Sessions. He believed that if the hon. and learned Baronet had had as much Parliamentary experience as himself he would have taken a different view of the means at the disposal of private Members to push their Bills. The question, which was debated on the supposed rights and wrongs of private Members, was really whether or not the whole comfort, decency, and dignity of Parliamentary legislation should be sacrificed to the possibility of a step or two more being taken with measures which everybody knew had no chance of becoming law. At present that useful institution, the Wednesday, gave every private Member the most ample opportunity, without let or hindrance, of preaching his sermon and expounding his scheme. Some of these measures, by a process of "natural selection," commended themselves to hon. Members generally, and when that was the case they were either directly or indirectly taken up by the Government, and little difficulty was found in passing them, particularly now, when the barriers of partizanship were so broken down, and when measures intended to benefit the people were sure to meet with a favourable reception on both sides of the House. A measure of that kind would be passed, if not in one Session, at any rate in the succeeding one. Then there were Bills which might be classified as the idiosyncracies of single Members of the House, or of small cliques. The individuals or bodies who had charge of such measures were among the greatest tyrants known to the House, for by persistently pushing their Bills forward at any and all hours they might possibly commit the House to some absurd or extravagant proposition. They knew their Bills could not become law, but, in defiance of common sense, they persisted in their courses, and because one man or a few men were obstinate, some 50 or 100 others had to remain in the House until late or rather early hours in order to prevent useless and, perhaps, hurtful measures slipping through. That was a state of things which would not be tolerated in any country other than England. It certainly would not in France, where in the crisis of a revolution the National Assembly could go on meeting at 2 o'clock in order to catch the 5 o'clock dinner train from Versailles to Paris. He did not recommend that as an example, but, in the face of the fact that many hon. Members were engaged in Committees from noon until the sitting of the House, he thought common sense ought to convince reasonable men that from noon till 4, and from 4 till half-past 12 was a sufficiently long sederunt, or, at any rate, was a period at which the House could claim to have reached an hour when the class of Business to be proceeded with during the rest of the night should be regulated. It must be remembered that it did not stop current questions, and that money Bills, the large category of Bills in Committee, and all as yet unopposed Business were excepted from the proposal before the House, which in fact only suggested that a selection should be made at half-past 12 out of the various classes of measures still to be considered. The proposal now made was adopted on the recommendation of one of the strongest Committees ever appointed in that House, and was approved by the late Lord Ossington—who was for some time Speaker of the House, and whose memory hon. Members all so deeply respected; it had been shaped as now proposed by the late Prime Minister—a man who never spared himself or anyone else when it was a question of work; and it had had the effect of lifting the House out of the barbarism of four or five Sessions ago into a state of comparative civilization. No one who had taken part in the persistent divisions, sometimes lasting on into the daylight of the summer mornings, in order to defeat useless and harmful measures, could help feeling something of shame for the part he took, but under the weak and defective system then in existence no other course was open. He hoped the House, therefore, would give a further trial to the new system which had worked well up to the present time.

MR. WHALLEY said, that when the report of that debate was read, the public would feel some surprise that no explanation was given of why it was that the House adopted a method of doing business which was totally without precedent. He therefore hoped some Member of the Government would explain the reasons which existed, if there were any, for transacting Parliamentary business during hours which were not adopted in the Legislative Assemblies of other countries, and which were altogether different from those devoted to other businesses in this country. The effect of the present system was disadvantageous to independent Members, but convenient for the Government, and that he supposed was the reason why the system had grown up and been perpetuated.

SIR THOMAS CHAMBERS thought people out-of-doors did not care much at what hours business was transacted, provided it was transacted. He should vote against the Amendment of the hon. Member for Swansea, that he might also vote against the original Motion. He should do so on the ground that the obvious result of passing either of them would be to prevent unofficial Members from carrying measures in that House. The hon. Member for Swansea himself acknowledged that his Motion was an invasion of the rights of private Members; and if it were to be adopted it should be in the shape of a Standing Order, and not by a mere Resolution of the House proposed by an individual Member. The most important business transacted by the House for many years had been transacted after half-past 12. The greatest speeches had been delivered after half-past 12, and as an ordinary rule the House was fuller at half-past 12 than at any other time, except, perhaps, when an interesting question was brought on at 5 o'clock in the afternoon. He would suggest, as a means of saving time, that the number of speakers be divided by three, and that their speeches be similarly reduced. If the Motion were carried without the Amendment, it would be impossible for an unofficial Member to carry a measure through its final stage, although the House might have approved it on the second reading, and have thoroughly discussed its clauses in Committee.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he was of opinion that there might be some advantage in the observance of uniformity and consistency in the proceedings. He, therefore, thought the proposed Amendment would effect a very reasonable compromise between the views held by different Members upon the subject. No doubt, the opinion of an overwhelming majority of the House was that opposed measures should not be taken after half-past 12. That he quite admitted; but the new rule had been diverted from its original object, and in the hands of some hon. Members had been the means of successfully opposing Bills which otherwise would not have met with any serious opposition. It was quite obvious that although a Member might not have much to say against a measure, he might very effectually oppose it simply by putting on the Paper a Notice of his opposition to it. When a Bill had passed the important stages of Second Reading and Committee, he thought the rule suggested by the hon. Member for Swansea should be acted upon. It was somewhat unreasonable that one solitary Member should stop a Bill on its final stage, simply by giving notice of opposition, and he trusted the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government would assent to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Swansea, and stand by the rule of which he had himself approved last Session, and which had been adopted by a large majority of the House.

Sir Thomas Chambers

MR. DISRAELI said, that if he stood by the rule he had always advocated he would not be in favour of the Amendment. He was a Member of the Committee on Public Business to which allusion had been made, and supported the principle that no new Business should be brought on after half-past 12—indeed, he was not quite sure that he did not originate the Motion himself. He thought the principle was a sound one, though in practice it might have been abused. He was not aware that it had been abused; but the same objection applied to any other arrangement that might be made in an Assembly like the present. The principle had been acknowledged to be sound by the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition, and it was the general feeling of the House that it was right. In all matters of this kind he (Mr. Disraeli) would consult the feelings of the House. There were no political or moral principles involved in the arrangement, and, therefore, on a question as to the management of their business, he thought the Government, as far as they could, ought to adopt the opinion of the majority of the House. Last year the Notice of Motion was brought forward by the hon. Member for Leicestershire under novel circumstances. A change of Government had taken place, and the conduct of Public Business involved different feelings on the part of hon. Members on the Treasury Bench to those which they had in Opposition. He was then of opinion that it would be better to modify the Motion, and that a trial ought to be given to the modification proposed by the hon. Member for Swansea. He could not say that he was satisfied with the working of the modified principle, for, in point of fact, it had never come into practice. Beyond that, he had become acquainted with the existence of a considerable amount of dissatisfaction among hon. Members who wished for a recurrence to the old rule, and he thought the modification of the rule would be rather an advantage to the Government, and was influenced by that consideration in agreeing to it. It did not signify much, he thought, whether the Motion was carried with or without the addendum. He did not think it would affect the length of the Session 48 hours. He had, however, come to the conclusion that the Motion of the hon. Member for Leicestershire was most in accordance with the wishes of Members, and therefore he should support it.

The House divided:—Ayes 49; Noes 91: Majority 42.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Resolved, That, except for a Money Bill, no Order of the Day or Notice of Motion be taken after half-past twelve of the clock at night, with respect to which Order or Notice of Motion a Notice of Opposition or Amendment shall have been printed on the Notice Paper, or if such Notice of Motion shall only have been given the next previous day of sitting, and objection shall be taken when such Notice is called.

OPEN SPACES (METROPOLIS) BILL, LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. WHALLEY moved for leave to bring in a Bill—

“for affording facilities for vesting in the Metropolitan Board of Works, open spaces, gardens, and squares within the Metropolitan District for the exercise and recreation of the public; and to empower owners or joint owners or a majority thereof, to enter into arrangements with the Metropolitan Board of Works in relation thereto.”

SIR WILLIAM FRASER asked for some explanation as to the object of the Bill. He believed it was similar to a measure which was introduced by the hon. Member during the last hours of the last Session. Judging from the title, it appeared to be one of the most comprehensive measures ever brought before Parliament; and he for one objected to such great powers being placed in the hands of the Metropolitan Board of Works. If, instead of vesting the open spaces in the Metropolitan Board of Works, they were vested in the Government, as having control of the police, much better order would be maintained. St. James's Park, for instance, was infested with the refuse of the Metropolis, so many filthy people lying about in all directions, that it had been called a dirty caricature of a battle-field.

MR. WHALLEY said, that since last Session, when his Bill was printed, he had consulted those who might be supposed to be primarily interested in the matter, the owners of property around the open spaces, and he had every reason to believe that the Bill would be likely to operate most beneficially. The object of the Bill was simply to give a certain majority, say two-thirds of the owners or joint owners of property adjacent to the squares and open spaces, an opportunity of having these places, not perhaps like Leicester Square, placed on particular days, or on certain hours at the service of the inhabitants. Many of the squares of London, which were almost a scandal and an eyesore, would become, if given up to the people, sources of enjoyment and recreation, and much moral good would consequently be effected. The experiment had been tried at the Temple Gardens, and with the most remarkable success. When people visited these breathing-places, they kept themselves and their children clean, having to mix with a better class of society, and the moral benefit resulting to poor persons was incalculable.

Motion agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. WHALLEY and Sir GEORGE BOWYER.

Bill presented, and read the first time.

QUESTION.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce a Bill, this Session, to fill up the vacancies in the representation of Ireland caused by the disfranchisement of the boroughs of Cashel and Sligo?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: We have no present intention of introducing a Bill to fill up the vacancies in question. I do not wish to underrate the importance of filling up vacancies in the representation of Ireland; but it must be remembered that there are several vacancies in the English representation from the same causes as that to which Cashel and Sligo owe their disfranchisement; and when the necessity may arise, it would appear to be advisable to deal with the subject as a whole.

PLEURO-PNEUMONIA—COMPULSORY SLAUGHTER.—QUESTION.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether the Irish Government intend to make compulsory as in England and Scotland the slaughter of animals affected with pleuro-pneumonia?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Last Session, in reply to a Motion made by the hon. Member, I pointed out the difficulties which led the Irish Government to consider it unadvisable to extend to Ireland the regulations relating to compulsory slaughter for pleuro-pneumonia in force in Great Britain. We see no reason at present to alter the decision then arrived at; and I may add that inquiries which during the autumn were made by the Irish Veterinary Department into certain cases in which it was alleged that this disease had been introduced into Great Britain by Irish stock, proved that in those instances the reports were without foundation.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY suggested that the Reports referred to should be laid upon the Table of the House.

POST OFFICE—MAILS BETWEEN SCOTLAND AND IRELAND.—QUESTION.

MR. ANDERSON asked the Postmaster General, The reason for the change of route in a large part of the Mails between Scotland and Ireland on 1st February; to what part of the two countries the change applies; whether it will expedite the conveyance of letters; and, whether the department is to gain or to lose money by the change?

LORD JOHN MANNERS, in reply, said, that the change had been made in order to expedite the conveyance of letters between the North of Ireland and certain towns and districts in the South of Scotland and North of England; and that, as in past experience, any increase of postal facilities had tended to increase the amount of correspondence, he had very great reason, in the present case, to hope that eventually there would be a benefit instead of a loss to the revenue.

MR. ANDERSON gave Notice that as the noble Lord's Answer did not accurately inform the House of the whole circumstances of the case, he would move for Papers on the subject.

IRELAND—SALARIES OF PETTY SESSIONS CLERKS.—QUESTION.

MR. FRENCH asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government, in view of the admission made last Session as to the inadequacy of the salaries of Petty Sessions Clerks in Ireland, to introduce any measure during the present Session for the increase of those salaries?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I have no intention of bringing in any measure with reference to the salaries of petty sessions clerks in Ireland; but the subject has engaged my attention during the Recess, and I hope by an improved application of the income derived from the "Fines Fund" to effect a material improvement in the salaries of those who most require it.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—SYSTEM OF RATING.—QUESTION.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce during the present Session a measure to substitute, wholly or partially, Union Rating for the present divisional system of Poor-Law Rating in Ireland?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: When the hon. Member for Limerick brought this question before the House last Session, I undertook to consider it during the Recess, and to endeavour to propose this year, some solution which, without leading to extravagant expenditure, might afford relief to heavily-rated electoral divisions. I have since made a very careful inquiry into the subject, and the result is that I think what is necessary may be effected in a better way than by Union rating, which, therefore, I do not intend to propose for adoption by the House. It was impossible to consider the area for Poor-Law taxation, without at the same time looking forward to the wider and more difficult subject of Grand Jury reform and the management and collection of county and baronial cess. I have now in preparation a measure dealing with the whole subject, in which will be included the adoption of a new area for purposes of local government and taxation, small enough to guard against the danger of extravagance, and sufficiently large to afford relief in Poor-Law taxation to the electoral divisions that require it.

IRELAND—IRISH PHARMACEUTICAL SOCIETY—GRAND JURY SYSTEM.

QUESTIONS.

MR. ERRINGTON asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether, in accordance with the recommendations of the Select Committee on the Apothecaries Licenses Bill, it is his intention to introduce this Session a Bill for the establishment of a Pharmaceutical Society in Ireland; also, whether the hope he held out last year, that he would, during the present Session, introduce a Bill for the reform of the Grand Jury system in Ireland is likely to be realized?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I have not overlooked the recommendations of the Select Committee to which the hon. Member refers, and I hope to be able to deal with it and the other subject referred to, during the present Session, if larger matters, such as that to which I have just alluded, leave me time to do so.

SLAVERY ON THE GOLD COAST.

QUESTION.

MR. W. CARTWRIGHT asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, When Papers will be presented in reference to recent transactions on the Gold Coast Settlement between Governor Strahan and the Native Chiefs for the suppression of slavery in the British Protectorate?

Sir Michael Hicks-Beach

MR. J. LOWTHER: Sir, Papers in reference to the subject referred to in the Question of the hon. Member were laid upon the Table on Tuesday last, and I hope will all be in the hands of hon. Members in the course of a day or two, if they have not already been delivered. They contain the memorials of the Kings and Chiefs, together with Governor Strahan's explanations and observations thereupon.

EXPLOSIVE SUBSTANCES—LEGISLATION.—QUESTION.

MR. WHITWELL asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If it is the intention of the Government to introduce a Bill this Session for the control of the manufacture and transport of explosive substances; and, if so, whether he contemplates the early introduction of the measure?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce such a measure. It had already been prepared, and he hoped to be able on an early day to lay it on the Table of the House.

IRELAND—IRISH CONVICT SERVICE—MOUNTJOY FEMALE PRISON.

QUESTION.

MR. SULLIVAN asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If there be any objection to his stating upon what grounds the deputy matron of Mountjoy Female Prison has been called upon to retire from the Irish Convict Service; and, whether it is true that the deputy matron in question was at first called upon to resign on medical grounds, and informed that the medical officers would examine her for the necessary report in such case, but that on the medical officers' report declaring her "fit for the full and efficient discharge of her office," a new ground of action was taken against her, and notification made of her absolute removal, without investigation or appeal, for not having more frequently made reports and complaints against her subordinates?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: In August and September last, there were very serious disturbances among the convicts in Mountjoy Female Prison, for which not a single convict was reported; and, upon inquiry, much laxity was discovered to exist among the discipline officers, and it appeared that the deputy matron, from her position and duty, must have been specially culpable in previously neglecting to report circumstances which must have come under her notice. For these reasons, to put a stop to a state of things which may be described as one of open insubordination, it was considered necessary that the deputy matron should be replaced by an active and efficient prison officer. She was not called upon to resign upon medical grounds, but it was desired to treat her with all possible consideration, on account of her length of service; and the medical officers examined her that she might receive the benefit of any doubt which might exist as to her being unable from natural causes to perform her duty.

MR. SULLIVAN intimated that he would move for correspondence on the subject.

PUBLIC WORKS LOAN ACTS CONSOLIDATION BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I have given Notice that I intend to ask for leave to introduce two Bills, the one to consolidate the Acts relating to Loans for Public Works, and the other to amend the same Acts. With regard to the first of these Bills, which is simply a Consolidation Bill, it is quite ready, and if the House should give me leave to introduce it, it can be circulated almost immediately. But with respect to the second, or the amending Bill, although the main principles on which it is to proceed are settled, and the Bill itself is in type, yet there are one or two points in it which still require consideration, and I shall not be able to put it in circulation immediately. It might, therefore, have seemed more proper that I should have waited a short time before moving for leave to introduce it. But I am induced to take the earliest opportunity of bringing it under the notice of the House, for this, among other reasons—that it is one of the measures to which my right hon. Friend at the head of the Government referred in the discussion on the Address, as measures which touch the question of local taxation; and, as being also rather important as laying the foundation for measures connected with local taxation. I therefore think it desirable the Bill should be brought under the notice of the House as early as possible. An impression appears to have got abroad in some quarters that, because no mention was made in the Speech from the Throne of the subject of local taxation, the Government have somewhat lost sight of that great question, and that their former zeal in respect to it has grown cold. But such an impression would be entirely unfounded. It is simply impossible that we can lose sight of this question, because it is a question which we run against in almost every one of the measures that we have to consider, and which we propose to introduce for improving administration of any kind in the country. We cannot bring forward a Bill for dealing with such a question as artisans dwellings, or for the consolidation of the sanitary laws, or any other Bill involving questions of social improvement, without in some shape or other having to consider how the measures proposed to be introduced affect, and are affected by, our system of local taxation. But we are taunted in some quarters with not coming forward and proposing some very large measure for the re-construction of the local administration of the country. Now, with regard to that, I would say that I am not aware that any Member of Her Majesty's Government has at any time ever expressed any intention of proposing any such measure, or has expressed himself in favour of dealing with the question upon those principles. I am quite aware that the late Government, when they were pressed on questions of local taxation, were generally ready to come forward with this answer—"You must wait—before we can do anything for the improvement of local taxation—until you have re-cast and improved your system of local administration." That was their doctrine, and I am not disposed to enter into any discussion as to their right to put it forward; but it has never been a doctrine advocated by us, and I frankly say it is a doctrine that we do not adopt. It has appeared to us that if we were to come forward with professions that we were about to introduce some great scheme for re-organizing the whole of the local constitution of the country, although we might create some sensation, and perhaps obtain credit for ingenuity in the scheme we proposed, we should not be furthering, but rather hindering, the great objects which we have in view; because we believe that, however you might lay down principles for a new constitution, you would find it very difficult indeed to bring about a scheme which would be passed by Parliament, or which, if passed by Parliament, would be found workable in the country. There are abundant constitutions which have been improvised. The public Press, the speeches of hon. Members of this House, and various other repositories of information teem with them as the bureaux of Abbé Sieyès teemed with constitutions for the French Republic. But if, in the present complicated state of the local institutions of this country, you were to bring forward and try to enforce a cut-and-dry new constitution, you would find that you had raised up an enormous host of difficulties which you would have to contend with, and you would really be retarding, not advancing, the great cause of local reform. While, however, I say that, let me add that we are conscious as anybody can be of the need of reforms in local administration and local taxation; that we do not abandon the hope that we may be able to introduce such reforms, but that we think the best and most advantageous way of introducing them is to do so gradually, by endeavouring to amend the system we have, by endeavouring to cure the defects we observe in it, and, above all, by endeavouring to let in as much light as possible into the inconveniences with which it abounds. We believe that if by degrees we can bring before the notice of the country in a practical and tangible form—if we can bring both before Parliament and the local constituencies themselves—the inconveniences and abuses which attach to the present system, we shall find that by degrees, and not by very slow degrees, we shall effect important modifications and improvements of that system. Now, one of the very first means which we think might be adopted with advantage to bring about those reforms would be the introduction of something in the nature of an annual local budget. We are strongly convinced that the attention of the country is not sufficiently drawn to the administration of local finance. The attention of Parliament itself, and that of the various local bodies which administer the local finances of the country, is not sufficiently drawn to the progress of rating, the progress of expenditure, and, above all, I may say, the progress of the contraction of debt. With reference to this point, I observed in a very able pamphlet, or rather in the re-production of some letters published in the course of the autumn by the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Rathbone)—whom I am sorry not to see in his place opposite—a passage on this subject which I will read to the House, and which, I venture to think, confirms the statement I have made. The hon. Gentleman says—

“While the attention of the nation is annually concentrated on the total amount and on the items of Imperial taxation, the particulars of local finance are known only to a few statisticians. The vast amounts expended and the extent of the loans contracted by these various local bodies throughout the country could not otherwise have escaped notice. The fact is that, while the future resources of the country are being heavily mortgaged for these debts, the attention given by men of property and of business to the manner and limits of this immense expenditure is constantly diminishing.”

I believe that these are very true observations, and that they point to an evil with which we ought to attempt to grapple. I do not intend to trouble the House with any great amount of statistics on this matter. The Returns some years ago moved for by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London (Mr. Goschen) threw a great deal of light on the subject; and other Returns are in course of preparation, and will shortly be presented, which will throw still further light upon it, because they will give us the total indebtedness of all the local bodies throughout the country, and they will show not only what is the amount of their indebtedness, but for what periods it has been contracted, from whom the money has been borrowed, and at what rate of interest it has been advanced, with other particulars. But I may mention generally that I believe it will be found that the amount of local indebtedness at the present time is somewhere about £72,000,000, and that it is advancing, on the whole, at the rate of something like £3,000,000 a-year. That large local indebtedness is going on with very little control on the part of anybody. Some bodies are borrowing, it may be, for sanitary purposes, while others in the same locality are borrowing for other purposes, such as building, highway purposes, &c.; and, in fact, numerous loans are contracted by different local bodies which are really independent the one of the other. These loans, I repeat, are effected without the consent or control, and often even the knowledge, of the various local constituencies concerned; the attention of the ratepayers whose property is being burdened is not called to the amount of the charge which is thus being imposed upon it. Then there is very little central control. There is, indeed, a certain power vested in the Treasury, in some cases, of exercising a control over the sums borrowed by mortgaging the property, or by mortgaging the rates of corporations or municipal bodies. But control is by no means exercised in every case; it cannot be exercised very effectively; and it is constantly defeated by the passing of personal or private Acts, which give these bodies the power of borrowing without coming under the notice of the Treasury at all. There certainly are some powers given to the Local Government Board, but those powers are by no means effective; and as to the notice taken by Parliament on the subject, it really amounts to next to nothing. If it were not for the energy and the scrupulous fidelity with which Lord Redesdale in the other House watches private Bills, probably a great deal more would be done in the way of creating local charges upon property than is done. But still considerable charges of this character are frequently being imposed on corporate and municipal property, practically without any control on the part of anyone. What the Government desire, therefore, to do, is to bring under the notice of Parliament the progress of this local indebtedness, and in such a way as to give Parliament some real interest in the matter, and induce them to take effective steps with regard to it. We propose to take steps for the introduction of something in the nature of what I have called a local budget; but we do not think it should be a local budget like the Indian Budget, which is merely laid before the House as a matter of information upon which nothing is to be done, and which attracts comparatively little notice when introduced towards the end of the Session. What we wish is, to see whether we can devise some system by which the attention of Parliament may necessarily be directed to the practical end in view—to the progress of local income, expenditure, and indebtedness at a reasonable time. Important as the matter is already, it is becoming more and more important every day; because as we go further in the direction of calling on local bodies to undertake this or that great measure, greater burdens are imposed upon them, and they are necessarily driven to incur a greater amount of debt. Those new Acts which we pass with regard to sanitary improvements, such Bills as that of my right hon. Friend the Secretary for the Home Department with reference to the dwellings of our artisans, measures dealing with education and other subjects, all tend in the same direction. And now, before I pursue that branch of the question further, I wish to draw the attention of the House to another subject which is closely connected with it, and which ought to be taken into consideration from an Imperial and also from a Treasury point of view—I allude to the way in which we deal with what is called the Public Works Loan Fund. The House is, no doubt, generally acquainted with the character of that fund, though I must confess I find a good deal of ignorance prevails with reference to it in quarters which ought to be better informed. The state of the case is this—There has been in existence now for between 50 and 60 years a system of some kind for the advance through the agency of Commissioners of public money to local bodies. I will not go back so far as 1792, when the first system of public loans began, but only to the period when the present system and its immediate predecessor sprang into being, which was in 1817. At that time the system was inaugurated of issuing, through the agency of Commissioners, Exchequer bills for the purposes of the prosecution of public works. That system went on until 1842, when it was modified, the system of granting Exchequer bills abandoned, and the system substituted for it of making advances directly from the Exchequer. The amount which by law the Public Works Loan Commissioners were authorized to draw from the Exchequer for that purpose was fixed at £300,000 a-year for the United Kingdom and £60,000 for Ireland. For the 30

struction put upon the Sanitary Act by the President of the Local Government Board. They have said—"This Act empowers you to give authority for loans for such and such purposes, but the purpose for which these gentlemen are coming, and which you have approved, does not seem to us to come within the range of the Act, and we think you have exceeded your authority." Then the Treasury is applied to; they say they have no authority in the matter. Nobody, in fact, can decide the point, and it is really a question between the firmness and the good nature of the gentlemen who act as Public Works Loan Commissioners. They, I am bound to say, are firm enough, and, having the command of the purse, they have generally got their own way; but they have done so with difficulty, and after battles which I think they ought not to have been called upon to fight. It will be better, therefore, that these matters should be settled by Parliament. We propose to include in these Bills certain regulations which, when passed by Parliament, will relieve the Public Works Loan Commissioners of the difficulty I have indicated. There is another administrative difficulty in the present state of things which I think is detrimental, or may be detrimental, to the public service, and it is this—the Public Works Loan Commissioners will sometimes make a loan at a high, or comparatively high rate of interest. There exists in certain cases, but not in all, power on the part of the Treasury to reduce that rate of interest. Now, very often there are gentlemen who come to the Treasury with very excellent objects, and say—"Will you request the Public Works Loan Commissioners to issue us a loan at 3½ per cent?" We say—"We have no power to do that; that rests entirely with the Commissioners." They go to the Commissioners; they get their loan, it may be at 5 per cent, and come to the Treasury and say—"We have got the loan at 5 per cent, but you have power to reduce the rate of interest. Will you do so?" Now, that is a power which it is not always expedient to exercise, and what I would point out is that there may be frequent cases during political crises and at other times when that power is capable of being abused. I do not say that it has ever been abused, but it is obviously capable of being abused, and therefore it ought not to exist. In these matters I think we should as far as possible restrict the discretion of the Treasury, and lay down rules by the authority of Parliament, leaving the application of these rules to the gentlemen who have already shown themselves so capable of managing the Public Works Loan Fund. What, therefore, we propose to do is to call upon all public bodies who expect to have to borrow to send in to the Department concerned, at some convenient time beforehand, a statement of the amount of money they will require in the coming year. Generally speaking, it would be to the Local Government Board, but there will be some cases in which they will send to the Board of Trade or some other Department, and we should expect that in the early part of the Session such Departments should lay before the Treasury an estimate, like the estimates of the War Department or the Admiralty, of the sums likely to be required in the course of the coming year, and that the Chancellor of the Exchequer or the President of the Local Government Board, whichever it might be, should come before Parliament once a year to present that estimate, and to ask Parliament to pass a Bill for the year authorizing the advance of the money required for the purposes stated. That would afford opportunity for a statement in the nature of a local budget being made on the introduction of the Bill, and, in fact, Parliament would naturally expect and require that when a Minister came forward and stated that such and such sums were to be authorized to be advanced in the course of the next 12 months for such and such purposes, he should both state what had been done with the money granted the previous year, and what had been the general progress of the indebtedness of the different Departments. In this way he would be able to give interesting and valuable information upon the progress of the expenditure, and the increase or decrease that had taken place in the course of the year in different localities. He would also be afforded a very fair opportunity of bringing under the notice of the House any proposals he might have to make for improving the system of giving assistance to localities, or for economizing in any way the advances or the expenditure under certain heads. By that means I believe that, besides introducing a very valuable and almost essential reform in the financial system of the country, we should lay the foundation of measures which ultimately, and perhaps at no very distant day, would lead to a great improvement in our local system of administration. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving for leave to introduce the first of the Bills he had referred to.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to consolidate the Acts relating to Loans for Public Works, ordered to be brought in by Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER and Mr. WILLIAM HENRY SMITH.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 54.]

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER then moved for leave to introduce a Bill to amend the Act relating to Loans for Public Works.

PUBLIC HEALTH BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. SOLATER-BOTH, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill for consolidating and amending the Acts relating to Public Health in England, said, he should not detain the House long in recommending the Bill to a favourable reception, because the consolidation of the Sanitary Acts had been frequently suggested in both Houses of Parliament as an object desirable of accomplishment. The House might, however, fairly expect to be told why this particular moment was selected for the purpose, seeing that the great labour which the Bill involved must necessarily have interfered with the preparation of other measures which some hon. Members might think more urgent. The House ought also to be told to what extent this proposed consolidation was likely to go, and how much of the old statute law would be swept away in the event of the Bill being adopted. Those who were desirous to go into the whole history of the Sanitary Acts from the earliest times, would find ample information in the Report of the Royal

Sanitary Commission of 1869. This Report went back to the time of Henry VI. and Henry VII.; but for all practical purposes—certainly for the purpose of the consolidation now proposed—it was not necessary to go back further than 1846-8, and then to come on to the present day. The Public Health Act of 1848 was passed under the pressure of alarm with respect to the invasion of cholera, and it was called for by a very considerable pressure of public opinion that greater powers of local administration in a sanitary sense were required, especially in the urban and populous districts. Both before and since that time, there had been, in addition to the public Acts, innumerable private Acts, which had provided for many of the more important towns in the country sufficiently satisfactory sanitary provisions and regulations. From 1848 down to the present day, public attention had been continually more and more directed to the question, and efforts had been made from year to year to improve and facilitate the local administration of the country. Many of the Bills which had been passed had been permissive, and others had been partly permissive and partly compulsory. They had been drawn upon different models, and had approached the same subject-matter from different points of view. Some had for their object the removal of nuisances, others the establishment of local authorities, the construction of works, the borrowing of money, and the improvement of towns, while in all there had been frequently contained provisions which touched or conflicted with the provisions of other Bills. One great object of the present Bill was to amend and reconcile provisions in previous Acts which were apparently, if not really, in conflict. Since the Provisional Order system came into operation, there had been passed many Provisional Order Confirmation Bills, which, though ostensibly applying to particular cases, had comprised proposals of law which had been made applicable to the whole community. The Sanitary Commission, in their Report, stated that the number of existing Sanitary Acts, and the mode in which they had been framed, rendered the state of the sanitary law unusually complex. This complexity, continued the Report, had arisen from the progressive and experimental character of modern legislation, which had led to the constant enlargement and extension of existing Acts, without any attempt at re-construction or regard to arrangement. Further on, the Report stated the result of all this to be, that the law was frequently unknown, and even when studied, difficult to be understood. The time had come for a consolidation of the law on general principles. Since the time to which he was referring, the Public Health Act of 1872 had been passed—an Act which for the first time met the great difficulty of sanitary administration over the whole country by dividing the Kingdom into urban and rural sanitary districts. It was felt at the time to be impossible to introduce into the Bill provisions to consolidate the law. The object of the measure was rather to apply the then existing law. Two years' experience of the working of that Act showed the necessity of making further amendments, in order to secure the due operation of the law, and, in consequence, he introduced, and Parliament passed, in last Session, a further amending Act. He was very much indebted to the indulgence of the House for passing what must have seemed to most hon. Members a very difficult, obscure, and incomprehensible Act, every clause of which was more or less of an amending clause, applying not merely to the principal Act, but also to the other Sanitary Acts which he was about to ask leave to amend. It would have been almost impossible to work the Public Health Act of 1872, if a digest had not been prepared by the officials of the Local Government Board and freely circulated among the local authorities who were charged with the duty of carrying out the provisions of the Act. It might be asked why these digests had not been carried further, so as to bring the law down to the present moment, and that would be a proper criticism, if it were not the case that as far as the Government could see, there was no further need for fresh legislation upon the subject. Her Majesty's Government felt that the time had come when it was incumbent upon Parliament to reconcile the Act of last Session with the Acts it more immediately amended, and it seemed almost impossible to do that without making a complete sweep of the 29 sanitary statutes which had been passed since 1846, with the exception of some few clauses contained in five or six of the measures. These few clauses would be dealt with in a future year, and in a measure which, though of much smaller compass, would still possess a comprehensive character. It was proposed to consolidate in this Bill the Public Health Acts of 1848, 1858, and 1872; the Sanitary Acts of 1866, 1868, and 1870; the Nuisance Removal Acts; the Local Government Acts from 1858; the Sewage Utilization Acts; the Towns Improvement Acts, and many others; and therefore he asked the House to allow the consolidated clauses to pass without much discussion and without opposition, and take them on the responsibility of his Department; and with regard to clauses where the construction was doubtful, and the provisions of law were in apparent conflict, he should make known to the House the grounds upon which the decision of the Government had been based, and ask the opinion of the House upon it. So much for the consolidation. He would now state the points on which he proposed to amend the existing Acts. It was proposed to add a provision as to the construction of sewers, which would enable expense to be avoided in certain cases. It was also intended to provide that local authorities should be empowered to obtain Provisional Orders under the Gas and Water Facilities Act; but this would not involve any question of competition with private companies, nor would it involve any compulsory action beyond what the Gas and Water Bills already contained. There would also be added to the existing power to provide mortuaries, a power to compel their provision in certain cases. There would also be an explanation or definition of that part of the Nuisances Act which related to the over-crowding of dwelling-houses, to the effect that a dwelling-house might be dealt with as over-crowded to such an extent as to constitute a nuisance, even though its occupants were all members of one and the same family. They also proposed to introduce a few amendments of a technical character, with which he need not now trouble the House. Power would be proposed to be given to the Local Government Board, by Provisional Orders, to group together districts in the same county for the joint appointment, under certain circumstances, of Medical Officers of Health. The appointment of medical officers under the Act of 1872 had been the subject of a great deal of controversy and dispute between the localities and the central authority, and it was hoped that this power might prove useful, and also conduce to economy in some cases. The House was aware, from the intimation on the subject in Her Majesty's Speech, that it was intended to introduce a measure in the course of the Session to deal with the pollution of rivers. As this was a Consolidation Bill, the Government thought that some attention should likewise be given to the purification of the atmosphere, and that it would be desirable to make some alteration in the law with regard to nuisances arising from smoke, offensive smells, &c., in order that the law might be carried more effectually into operation. He was very much impressed, from the first moment he took the place he had now the honour to fill, by the widely-spread opinion as to the necessity for further provisions on that subject. One of the first duties, therefore, which he undertook was to propose to Parliament an amendment of the old Alkali Act, and he was led to hope and believe, from his experience in the conduct of that measure, that if the Government made the remedies against ordinary nuisances more effective, they would find the owners of works, trades, and manufactures lend themselves to this feeling, and not be reluctant to permit the new changes in the law to be effected. He had received a deputation the other day, composed of gentlemen from the Tyne, Mersey, and Thames—gentlemen who represented associations formed for the purpose of enforcing the removal of such nuisances as he had already alluded to—and he could only regret that he was unable at that time to give them a more definite assurance that their wishes would be attended to. Those gentlemen desired that there should be a system of inspection to regulate the proceedings of manufactures in regard to smoke from furnaces. But, without undertaking anything on so large a scale, the Government hoped by a few simple provisions to enable what was the known and certain intention of the law to be more effectively applied. First, he proposed to enable a local authority to take such proceedings to remove a nuisance without their district as they could take under the existing law to remove a nuisance within their district. At present the law was that no local authority might proceed against a nuisance, unless the cause of it arose within their district. Then it was proposed to repeal a provision of the law which he was told had made the process which was laid down in the Nuisance Removal Acts almost ineffective. If a defendant entered into his recognizances to abide the result of an action at law or proceeding in equity, thereupon the proceedings of the local authorities were stayed. That course was found to be extremely expensive and objectionable, and the provisions as to summary procedure were thereby rendered null and void. The Government hoped they might be able to insert a clause in the Bill, which would provide that a person who only assisted in an accumulated nuisance should not be able to escape punishment by pleading that he was only one of many parties guilty of such nuisance. He thought that if these proposals were accepted they would enable parties to obtain remedies which they could not now obtain, and would be found beneficial to the country at large. It must be borne in mind that the Bill which he wished to introduce would not interfere with those provisions of the law which were passed in the interests of those traders and manufacturers who had made or endeavoured to make arrangements for the consumption of noxious vapours or smoke. There was only one other provision to which he wished to call the attention of the House. Under one of the Nuisance Removal Acts a general exemption was introduced of mines and mineral products; and subsequently, in an Act passed 10 years later, smoke was made a nuisance for the first time. He proposed to modify the terms of that exemption, only so far as to enable the obligations of the law to be brought home to all parties, assuming that there was sufficient public spirit in the various local authorities in all parts of the country to carry out these obligations. He would not detain the House further in asking for leave to introduce his Bill.

INTERNATIONAL COPYRIGHT BILL.

RESOLUTION. FIRST READING.

(In the Committee.)

MR. BOURKE, in rising to move "That the Chairman be directed to move the House, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Law relating to International Copyright," said, the Bill was exactly the same as that which passed through the Commons last year, but did not get through all its stages in the House of Lords in time to enable it to become law.

MR. E. JENKINS said, he did not oppose the Motion for the introduction of the Bill; but he must express the strong feeling of dissatisfaction which was entertained against the Government because they had not seen fit to introduce a Bill of a more general character in reference to the important subject of International Copyright. Last year the Secretary for Foreign Affairs was waited on by deputations, who represented to him the serious injustice which was experienced by authors in Great Britain in consequence of the present state of the law. Probably, there was no class of Her Majesty's subjects who suffered at this moment such wrongs as authors. If he were asked to classify Her Majesty's subjects from below upwards, he should begin with the scavengers, theirs being the lowest trade, put sweeps in the second place, and in the third, authors. Not only were authors subjected to injustice at the hands of their publishers at home, but they were continually plundered by publishers abroad. Again and again had this subject been brought under the notice of the Foreign Office, with special reference to the plunder of British authors by publishers in the United States of America. The United States had repeatedly beaten us in diplomacy by means of knowledge obtained from the brains of British authors, and yet American publishers were permitted year after year to continue this plunder, without any attempt being made on the part of the Foreign Secretary to get the injustice remedied. When he saw that a measure was to be introduced with so large a title as "International Copyright" he had hoped that the hon. Gentleman would submit to the House something more worthy of

Motion agreed to.

Resolved, That the Chairman be directed to move the House, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Law relating to International Copyright.

MUNICIPALITY OF LONDON BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

LORD ELCHO, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill for creating a County and Municipality of London; and for other purposes connected therewith, said, that at the present stage, he only proposed to make a brief explanation of the Amendments which had been introduced into the Bill since it had been circulated among hon. Members. The question of the government of the City of London had been so often before the House, had been so freely canvassed in the Press and elsewhere, that it was only necessary for him to say that the object contemplated by the measure was to bring about in our great metropolis improved, harmonious, and economical government, by establishing unity of administration. It was believed this could be done by extending the City Corporation over the whole of London; in fact, by walking upon the old lines of the City Constitution, guided by the light and chart of the Municipal Act of 1835. A Bill, based upon this general principle, was drawn up last autumn, and taken to the Secretary of State at the Home Office, in the hope that Her Majesty's Government would be induced to take up the question—a question which previous Ministers had said was one of first importance, and one which ought to engage the attention of Parliament at the earliest possible time. The Government received the promoters of the Bill most civilly, but expressed no direct opinion concerning the course they intended to take. He did not ask on the present occasion for any direct statement of opinion from his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary; indeed, he would rather his right hon. Friend would silently allow the Bill to be brought in, because it differed very materially from the Bill which was presented to him in the autumn. For his own part, though he approved the general principles of the Bill as it was presented to his right hon. Friend and circulated in the Press, he wished to state that he never saw it until it was actually in print. What he held himself to be individually responsible for was the Bill as it had since been altered. The changes introduced must render it more acceptable to the Government, to the House, to the Corporation of London, and to the metropolis in general. They might be stated in a very few words. In the first place, the changes would secure Imperial authority if they created a great united municipal government over 5,000,000 of people. This would be done by giving a veto to the Secretary of State, or to some authority on the part of the Crown, whose approval would be necessary for the appointment of the Mayor, the Deputy Mayor, the Recorder, and the Common Serjeant. Then, as regards the police, in the Bill as originally drawn, they were placed wholly under the control of the Corporation; but it was manifest that the objections urged against this proposal rested on sound grounds, and it was now proposed to do nothing at all in reference to the police, but to leave it to the Secretary of State and the House of Commons in Committee to decide how they would deal with the Imperial question of the police of this vast metropolis. As regards the question of property, he had always stood up in that House as a defender of the rights of property, and he should be the last man to countenance any encroachments on the rights of property. Under the original Bill, there was a clause for taking possession of the property of the Corporation of London, with a view to spread it over the whole of the new municipality; but it was now proposed that property accumulated by that ancient Corporation should not be taken from it without its consent. Next he came to the question of persons. The Bill took the greatest care of vested interests, and all rights, privileges, and immunities were reserved in the Bill as it originally stood. Still, he thought it might have done more in reference to one officer at present existing. Under Mr. Mill's Bill on this subject, introduced some years ago, there was to be a Chairmanship of Committees, and the then existing Chairman of the Board of Works, Sir John Thwaites, was directly appointed by that Bill as the first Chairman of Committees, at his existing salary. It was now proposed to follow the precedent of Mr. Mill's Bill, and the present Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works was named in the Bill, first Chairman of Committees, with the same salary he now received and the same tenure of office, which was from year to year. Lastly, he came to the question of vestries. It was proposed in the altered Bill to recognize the existence of the vestries, which the Bill, as it originally stood, did not recognize. The existence of the Metropolitan Board of Works was recognized, and its members would for the first three years be taken into the General Municipal Council. It was proposed, therefore, that the vestries should be recognized as an existing corporate body, having to do with the local government of the metropolis, by inviting them to nominate one or two members of their own body to form part of the General Municipal Council. He believed that if the scheme were adopted, the best men of the present Local Boards would become members of the new municipality. These were the changes he proposed to make in the Bill as it was originally drawn. He believed they were improvements, and he hoped he should be allowed to lay the Bill, as amended, on the Table of the House.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, he could not congratulate his noble Friend on the alterations he had made in his original Bill. In his opinion, the principal so-called amendments were anything but improvements, and made the measure more objectionable than it was before. He referred especially to the proposed alteration by which the Secretary of State was to have the power of vetoing the appointment of the Chief Magistrate of the municipality, as well as having a veto on other appointments made by the municipality. A provision of that sort would destroy the principle of municipal government, and overthrow the first principle of those municipal liberties which were a part of the Constitution of the country and of its history. The principle of municipal government was self-government—the government of the municipality by the representatives of the people themselves, subject to the law, and not to the Executive authority of the State. The municipality ought, above all things, to have the power of electing their own Chief Magistrate. He was aware that under the present system it was the custom that the Lord Chancellor should express the sanction of the Crown to the appointment; but that was virtually a matter of form, as was the case also with respect to the election of the Speaker. The House did not suppose that the Crown had any veto upon the election of the Speaker, and the City of London would consider themselves deprived of their right to elect their Lord Mayor if the election was to be subject to the veto of the Secretary of State. It would amount to the introduction of the French system of electing mayors, which he did not think the people of this country would approve, and he should use his best efforts to withstand it. He believed the noble Lord's scheme to be an impracticable one. A corporate body comprising the whole of the metropolis would, in his opinion, be unwieldy; such a plan would not work at all. It would be an immense system, including some 4,000,000 of people—a population equal to that of many kingdoms. It would require the management of the finances by a Chancellor of the Exchequer, and a very extensive machinery. Another objection to the Bill was this—that the proposed municipality might in troublesome times be found to interfere materially with the prerogative of the Crown and the authority of Parliament. He was entirely opposed, too, to the provision of the Bill which would place the police of the City of London under the control of the Executive Government. It was acknowledged that the police in Scotland Yard were not equal in efficiency to the police of the City of London, and there was no reason whatever for the change suggested by his noble Friend. For his part, he believed that an Act to enable districts to affiliate themselves with the Corporation of London would meet all that was required, and such boroughs as wished to have a municipality of their own might come to the House for an Act of Parliament to enable them to give effect to their views.

LORD ELCHO observed, that the speech of his hon. and learned Friend had evidently been prepared against the original Bill, and not against the Bill, as amended, which he asked leave to introduce. His hon. and learned Friend had therefore had to perform the difficult task of making his intended speech fit an altered state of things. He had, however, admitted the case of the metropolis to be an exceptional one, and it was only in such an exceptional case that the principle objected to could be applied. He would remind his hon. and learned Friend, too, that not only in the case of the election of Lord Mayor, but in that of the election of Recorder of London was the approval of the Crown required.

Sir George Bowyer

Motion agreed to.

Bill for creating a County and Municipality of London, and for other purposes connected therewith, ordered to be brought in by Lord ELCHO, Mr. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH, and Mr. STAVELEY HILL.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 61.]

STANDING ORDERS.

Select Committee nominated:—Sir EDWARD COLERBROOKE, Viscount CRICHTON, Mr. CURRIE, Mr. THOMSON HANKEY, Mr. HENLEY, Mr. HOWARD, Sir GRAHAM MONTGOMERY, Mr. MOWBRAY, The O'CONOR DON, Mr. SCOURFIELD, and Mr. WHITBREAD.

SELECTION.

Committee nominated:—Mr. THOMSON HANKEY, Sir GRAHAM MONTGOMERY, The O'CONOR DON, Mr. SCOURFIELD, Mr. WHITBREAD, and the Chairman of the Select Committee on Standing Orders.

MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. DODDS, Bill to amend the Law regulating Municipal Elections, ordered to be brought in by Mr. DODDS, Mr. GOURLEY, Mr. CALLENDER, and Mr. RATHBONE.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. BRUCE, Bill to reform and assimilate the systems of Local Self-government in force in certain cities and towns in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. BRUCE, Sir ARTHUR GUINNESS, Mr. CORRY, Mr. KAVANAGH, and Mr. MULHOLLAND.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 58.]

POOR REMOVAL BILL.

On Motion of Mr. DOWNING, Bill to amend certain Acts of Parliament by which Boards of Guardians in England and Parochial Boards in Scotland are empowered to remove to Ireland persons born in that country and their wives and children who may receive relief from the Povers Rate, ordered to be brought in by Mr. DOWNING, Mr. FRENCH, Mr. POWER, and Mr. O'SHEA-GHNESSY.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 59.]

ALLOTMENTS EXTENSION BILL.

On Motion of Sir CHARLES DILKE, Bill to extend the Act of the second year of King William the Fourth, chapter forty-two, ordered to be brought in by Sir CHARLES DILKE, Mr. EDWARD JENKINS, and Mr. BURT.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 57.]

QUEEN'S SPEECH.—HER MAJESTY'S

THE LORD STEWARD (Earl BEAUCHAMP) reported Her Majesty's Answer to the Address, as follows:—

"MY LORDS,

"I THANK you sincerely for your loyal and dutiful Address.

"You may be assured that I shall always heartily co-operate with you in all Measures that may be calculated to promote the happiness and contentment of My People."

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS.

BILL PRESENTED. FIRST READING.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, I have so often received the indulgence of your Lordships when bringing before you subjects which were technical and devoid of general interest, that I think I shall not be without your forbearance now when I ask your attention to a subject interesting in itself, which is exciting great interest out-of-doors, and regarding which any legislation which may now be determined upon cannot but be attended with important effects, for good or for evil, upon the manufacturing and inventive interests of the country. My Lords, it may be asked, why it is that Her Majesty's Government at this time propose legislation on the Patent Laws. My Lords, the development of manufactures and commerce in this country of recent years has excited attention in an unusual degree to the state of the laws of this country which afford protection to inventors; and, my Lords, the result has been that there has arisen what I may call a two-fold controversy—a controversy conducted, on the one hand, by those who think there ought to be no Patent Laws at all; a controversy, on the other hand, pressed forward by those who, while desiring to retain the protection of patents, seek a considerable alteration in the Patent Laws as they now exist. It is now, I think, 12 years since, in the other House of Parliament, I ventured to propose a Resolution, which was seconded by my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (the Earl of Derby), for a Royal Commission to inquire into the working of the Patent Laws. That Commission was issued, and there sat on it men whose names will, no doubt, carry confidence with your Lordships. Lord Hatherley, Lord Overstone, my noble Friend the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, Sir William Erle, Mr. Justice Grove, Mr. Forster, and Sir William Fairbairn were members of that Commission. It heard a great deal of evidence; it made a Report to which I shall have to refer, and it recommended certain changes in the laws regarding patents. My Lords, nothing was done in consequence of the Report of that Commission; but in the years 1871 and 1872 a Select Committee of the House of Commons was appointed to inquire into the same subject. It sat, and entered into an elaborate inquiry. And, my Lords, having read the evidence given before that Committee, I think I may assure your Lordships that if at any time you desire reading that will afford you both deep interest and much amusement you will find it in the report of that evidence. Some of the greatest inventors and of the most scientific men of the present day contributed to the knowledge collected by the Committee. There were among them Mr. Bessemer, Mr. Schneider, of the Creusot Ironworks, Sir William Armstrong, Mr. Nasmyth, Mr. Bramwell, and many others too numerous to mention; and in addition the Committee had the advantage of hearing the opinions of Lord Selborne and Mr. Justice Grove, who stated their views, the result of their long experience as to the working of the Patent Laws. That Committee made its Report and recommended changes in the Patent Laws. Since that time—in 1873—the Universal Exhibition at Vienna was held, and on that occasion what was termed “The International Patent Congress” also assembled in that city. Persons from all parts of Europe who were interested in the Patent Laws met there and gave their opinions, and arrived at certain resolutions, to which I shall have to refer, as the basis on which, in their judgment, the Patent Laws of any country ought to be framed. In the Reports of the Commission and of the Select Committee and in those Resolutions come to at Vienna your Lordships have a large body of evidence on the subject: but you have also in them what appear to me the great landmarks as to the direction in which any alteration of the laws as to patents ought to proceed. Since the date of the Congress at Vienna I have been a witness myself—from the deputations that have come to me on the subject—of the loud and continuous demand from those persons who are engaged in manufactures, that some alterations should be made in order to give effect to those various recommendations which have been made from time to time. This, my Lords, is the reason why Her Majesty’s Government have come to the conclusion that some effort should be made to respond to those demands and an attempt be made to improve those laws. I shall endeavour to shorten as much as I can the field over which I have to travel, and I may at once tell your Lordships that I do not intend to enter into any argument upon the abstract question whether patents should exist at all. I have never been an enthusiastic admirer of the Patent Laws in their present condition as suited to this country. I am aware that objections—very serious objections—may be urged against the existence of such laws at all. On the other hand, I know that there are arguments—strong arguments—in favour of the Patent Laws, and that there is now in this country a strong feeling that Patent Laws should be maintained. I believe that between those two extreme propositions the truth lies. The Patent Laws we have may be so amended as to prove beneficial to the country; but, on the other hand, I am convinced that if these laws be not amended, and if objections now urged against patents are not removed, the days of patents are numbered, and an end must come to them altogether. Neither, my Lords, do I intend to occupy your Lordships’ time with arguments as to the principle on which Patent Laws, if they are to exist, ought to proceed. I know that there are some persons who hold that inventions are property, and that the owners of inventions should be protected, just as the owners of lands or of other property are protected in their ownership. My Lords, I do not admit the proposition. I believe that if it held good, you must give the inventor protection not for 14 years or any other term, but protection without any limitation as to time. Not only is that so, but if an invention be property in the sense that everybody understands the word, you must admit the right of the inventor who declines to use his own invention to prevent its being used by anyone else. The assumption to which I have been referring seems to me to proceed on a palpable fallacy. A man’s invention is his own, and he may proceed to use it; but it is wholly another thing when he seeks to prevent anybody else from using it. The question of allowing him to do this is not one of property or of abstract right, but one of expediency, respecting which the State is quite entitled to make a bargain, and the only consideration is on what terms an exclusive right of user should be allowed to him.

Now, my Lords, it often occurred to me that if you were to ask in this country by what authority is it that patents are granted, the first idea that would come into any one’s mind would be that some Parliamentary enactment was the original authority. But that would be entirely a mistake. It is a somewhat singular thing that at this moment the granting of patents, exercising as it does a most important influence on the whole of the manufactures of this country, does not depend upon an Act of Parliament, but on the old prerogative of the Crown. Your Lordships will recollect a statute well-known as the “Statute of Monopolies;”

it was passed in the 21st year of the reign of James I., in consequence of promises made by Queen Elizabeth, but which had not been observed. The object of the statute was to put an end to a number of monopolies, some of which applied to food; but an exception was made in the Act by the preservation of an old prerogative of the Crown, and that was the origin of the Patent Laws which exist to this day. The 6th section of the Act declares that the abolition of monopolies does not "extend to any Letters Patent and grants of privilege for the term of 14 years or under, hereafter to be made, of the sole working or making of any manner of new manufactures within the realm to the true and first inventor and inventors of such manufactures."

That was a reservation to the Crown of its old prerogative of granting monopolies—the reservation, as your Lordships see, being in the granting of patents of 14 years for what could be described as "new manufactures within the realm." That is the origin of the present system of Letters Patent.

I will now ask your Lordships to pass from the history of these grants to the comparatively recent period of 25 years ago. In the year 1852 the whole system of granting patents came to be regulated by Act of Parliament, and three great changes were then effected. For the first time, it was provided that one patent should do for the whole of the United Kingdom. Up to that time three several patents were necessary for England, Ireland, and Scotland. Again, it was then determined that a patent for the United Kingdom should be granted at an expense very much lower than that which had been previously required. Up to that period patents for the Three Kingdoms cost between £300 and £400. Further, the Act of 1852 made another innovation as regards expenses, which has worked exceedingly well. It provided that on the first application for a patent the applicant should have to pay only £5; and that at certain stages, which would run over six months, he should have to make payments amounting in all to £25. He was to pay no more till the end of three years, at the expiration of which time, if he wished to keep his patent, he was to pay £50 more. At the end of seven years, if he wished his patent to run to 14 years, he was to pay £100 more, which, for a patent of 14 years, would make a total payment of £175. The next alteration made by the Act was this—a provision was made that there might be what is called a "provisional protection"—that is to say, the applicant for a patent was to put on paper what is called a "provisional specification," containing the general outlines of his invention. This was to be deposited in the proper office, and during a period of six months he was to be at liberty to make experiments in the use of his invention, without the danger to which he might otherwise have been exposed if he delayed taking out a patent and his invention became known throughout the country. And now, my Lords, let me call your Lordships' attention to some of the results of the Act of 1852 by comparing the receipts in 1859 and in 1873. In 1859 the receipts from patents were £87,300, and the surplus, after all expenses connected with the granting of those patents, was £21,600. In 1873 the receipts had risen to £144,760, and the surplus to £90,000. Now, let me bring under your Lordships' notice the number of patents. I quoted to your Lordships the words in the Act of James, which states the reservation to be in favour of patents for "new manufactures within this realm." How many of these "new manufactures" do your Lordships suppose spring up within the course of a year in this country? No fewer than 4,300 a-year, or nearly 100 a-week, or something like 15 for every working day. If all these be for "new manufactures within this realm" it must be admitted that we have a most fertile inventive genius at work in this country. I will now state what becomes of these patents. I am taking my figures in round numbers, and by a comparison of several years, and I find that of the whole number of original applications for patents, one-third fall off before the time of sealing the patents, the inventions having been found to be not worth the expense of sealing. Of those which have been sealed, at the end of the third year seven-tenths or 70 per cent drop off, it having been found that the invention is not worth the payment of the £50: and two-tenths or 20 per cent of the remainder drop off at the end of seven years, it having been found not worth while to pay the other £100 to secure the patent for 14 years. So your Lordships will see that only one-tenth of the entire number of cases in which patent rights are originally applied for remain to run the whole course of 14 years.

That being the state of things as to patents, will your Lordships allow me to point out the defects which I think it is generally agreed exist in the present system? Those who have not looked into these matters will be, perhaps, surprised to hear as an accurate statement that there is absolutely no examination in this country of an invention before a patent is granted for it. In point of form, there is the presumption of such an examination—and no doubt the Act of 1852 implies that there ought to be such an examination by enacting that the Law Officers of the Crown may call in experts to assist them in granting patents. But, in point of fact, that provision is not, nor cannot be, acted upon. I find that in 1872 only 62 applications, and in 1873 only 78 applications for patents were rejected by the Law Officers. I should say that they were rejected on regulations as to form, and not from any objections as to substance. From my own experience when I was one of the Law Officers of the Crown, I know that an examination of inventions by the Law Officers is found to be impossible, and your Lordships will not be surprised that with their other duties the Law Officers cannot make any real examination of inventions which pour in at the rate of about 100 a-week. The second defect in the system is this—The provisional specification of which I have told your Lordships, and which is the document which describes the character of the invention, is kept absolutely secret during the period of protection. I do not think it was intended in the Act of Parliament that this should be, but in practice it is so. An advertisement appears in the papers announcing that a patent has been applied for by a person of a particular name; but the allusion to the particular invention is as general as possible, and the provisional specification cannot be seen by the world until the patent is sealed. If any one have reason to suspect that his patent or his invention is being infringed on by the person applying for the patent, he is not in a position to take any very effective steps to ascertain whether his suspicions are well founded, inasmuch as he is not allowed to see the specification. A third objection is this—The provisional specification is drawn up in the general way I have described; but when the patent comes to be sealed, it is sealed not in accordance with that specification, but in accordance with the complete and final specification, which is attached to the patent on its being completed. The applicant is permitted, between the time of his provisional and his complete specification to make any changes he pleases in his design, and there is no control over him to see that the complete specification does not depart from the provisional one. The consequence is this—You have granted in this country every year the enormous number of patents I have mentioned, taking one year as an instance of all. And what is the effect upon the industry of the country of a system which allows, without check and without examination, a number of patent rights to be created? My Lords, you will find it described by the Royal Commission which reported in 1865 in words much better than any which I could use. The Commissioners say—

“From a paper drawn up at our request by the Superintendent of Specifications, it appears that upon examining into the first 100 applications for patents in each of the years 1855, 1858, 1862, the results were, in his opinion, that in 1855, 26 were manifestly bad for want of novelty, and six more partly so; in 1858, 14 manifestly old and one partly so; in 1862, seven were old and one would probably turn out to be so. An instance, illustrating the mode in which these patents are used, is given in evidence, where royalties had been demanded, and in most cases obtained, by the patentee of a machine which turned out upon investigation to be identical with one which 19 years before had been well known and publicly used. Other instances will be found in the evidence of particular manufactures and branches of invention which are so blocked up by patents, that not only are inventors deterred from taking them up with a view to improvement, but the manufacturer in carrying on his regular course of trade is hampered by owners of worthless patents, whom it is generally more convenient to buy off than to resist. The evil also results in another practice having the same obstructive tendency—namely, that of combination among a number of persons of the same trade to buy up all the patents relating to it, and to pay the expense of attacking subsequent improvers out of a common fund. From a comparison of evidence, it cannot be doubted that this practice prevails to a considerable extent. We must also conclude that when the obstruction is not to be got rid of without the expense and annoyance of litigation, in a large majority of cases the manufacturer submits to an exaction rather than incur the alternative.”

mons gave an opinion in substance to the same effect; and they recommended—

“That protection for a limited period, and dating back to the time at which it is applied for, should only be granted for an invention on its nature, and particular points of novelty, being clearly described in a provisional specification, and upon the report of a competent authority that such invention, so far as can be ascertained by such authority, is new, and is a manufacture within the meaning of the law.”

The International Congress at Vienna arrived at the same conclusion—that patents ought not to be granted without a preliminary examination of some kind. In fact, if your Lordships only think of the matter for a moment you will see that something of the kind is absolutely necessary. I cannot imagine anything more serious to the manufactures of the country than that 4,300 drag-nets, more or less, should be annually spread, every one of them curtailing to some extent the area of those manufactures, and every one of them exposing manufacturers to litigation, or, perhaps, to the payment of black-mail if they would escape the irksome process of litigation for an alleged infringement of patent-right.

Now, my Lords, let me explain what Her Majesty's Government propose in the way of amendment of the Patent Laws. The present Commissioners of Patents are the Lord Chancellor, the Master of the Rolls, and the Law Officers of the Crown. The Act of 1852, which created the Commission, contemplated that other persons might be nominated by the Crown to act as Commissioners, but, as it appears, no other persons have been nominated. Now, my Lords, we propose to enlarge the composition of the Commission, not by the addition of paid Commissioners, but by the addition of unpaid Commissioners, who are not to be charged with the examination of details—that is provided for in another way—but who are to superintend the general arrangements of the Patent Office and the Patent Museum, and to define the regulations under which patents are to be applied for and granted. We propose that five other members—three on the nomination of the Board of Trade and two on the nomination of the Lord Chancellor—should be added to the Commission. We expect that men of scientific and manufacturing eminence will be found willing, as a mark of distinction, to serve on the Commission and perform the duties that will be imposed on them. These duties will involve no great sacrifice of time, but the advice and assistance of such persons, conversant with manufactures and the arts, will be of much advantage to the country. In fact, it would be utterly impossible to secure the services of such persons as paid members. There are some men who would be very useful on the Commission, but whom no payment that could be offered to them would induce to resign the occupations in which they are engaged. Well, my Lords, that being the composition of the Patent Commission—very considerable authority will be given to the Commissioners in respect of the conditions on which patents are to be granted. We also propose that there should be attached to the Patent Office officers to be called “Examiners of Patents.” The Bill provides that they shall not be fewer than two nor more than four in number. We propose that these Examiners, who are to be gentlemen with competent legal, and scientific knowledge, should give their whole time to the business of their office, and that their duty shall be to acquaint themselves, in the first instance, with the contents of the Patent Office, and all the documents in use in that Office. Then, my Lords, we propose that every application for a patent shall be accompanied by a specification which must describe, not provisionally and in general terms as at present, but as fully as the inventor can describe it, the nature of the invention. We propose that this specification shall be referred to one of the Examiners in conjunction with one or more Referees. We propose that there shall be a panel of these Referees prepared by the Board of Trade, and consisting of men generally skilled in arts, science, and manufactures, who, without giving up the whole of their time to such duties, may be ready to express an opinion on any particular application for a patent. The points to which their opinions will be directed are these:—Whether the invention is a proper subject for a patent within the Statute of Monopolies; whether the specification is sufficient; whether the invention, as far as can be judged from an examination of former specifications and other documents in the Patent Office—they are not to go further than documents enable them to go in this direction—is a new one; whether the invention is wholly or mainly a combination of some known machinery, processes or substances; whether by reason of its frivolous character or for any other reason the invention is unworthy of a patent; whether, in consideration of such combination as I have just alluded to, or because the invention is not of considerable importance, it is expedient that the duration of the patent shall be limited to 7 instead of 14 years. The reason of this is that there are a number of inventions, which though they must be classed as inventions do not amount to more than a combination of some machinery, or process, or substance already in use, and are not worthy of being put on a footing with the great inventions of the country. The opinion of the Examiners in conjunction with the Referees, and the application itself is to come before the Law Officers—because we propose that with the Law Officers shall still rest the responsibility of passing a patent, though they are to have the assistance I have described. If on these materials the Law Officers are of opinion that the patent should be granted it will be granted as at present; but with this condition—that the patent will not be sealed for six months from the first application, and that in the meanwhile any person who may have objection to the granting of the patent may have the opportunity of making his objection, and there will be an appeal from the Law Officers to the Lord Chancellor or one of the officers of the High Court of Justice, to be named for hearing such appeals by the Lord Chancellor. If the Law Officers refuse the application for the patent the applicant will have the opportunity for appeal in the same way; and so also in reference to the question whether the patent shall be for 7 or 14 years in the first instance. There will be a third appeal—one in case the patent has been granted for only seven years; but we propose that in this case there should be no appeal in the first instance, and for this reason—because, whether the patent should be extended to 14 years may depend upon experience gained in the actual working of the invention. But at a certain time before the expiration of the seven years, application may be made with the light of that experience for an extension of the patent to 14 years. These are the proposals of the Bill with regard to the preliminary examination and granting of patents.

I have told your Lordships that in the first instance the inventor is to make his specification as full as possible; but there will be allowed a term for provisional, as distinguished from complete specifications. Your Lordships will readily understand that experiments made within six months may lead to a considerable expansion of the specification. We, therefore, propose that the applicant should have power to amend his specification before the time of the sealing of the instrument; but the amendment must be made under the control of the Law Officers, who will refuse to allow it if it be any improper extension of the invention, or material departure from the original specification. It is also proposed that even after the patent is sealed there shall be a right of amendment, in order that any technical difficulty may be obviated. There will also be in the Bill a provision for disclaimers. Then how do we deal with the question of prolongation? Your Lordships may be aware that under the present system the owner of a patent may apply to Her Majesty in Council for an extension of the patent beyond the term of 14 years, for 7 years, or even for another 14 years. It has been much debated whether that is a wise provision in the law. The Royal Commission which reported in 1865 stated that in the opinion of the Commissioners no such prolongation ought to be allowed. And, my Lords, it appears to me that the objections to a prolongation are very serious. In the first place, it is very difficult to lay down the principle on which a patent should be prolonged. The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council have endeavoured to define it, and I know it has been held by them that the patent should be a meritorious one, and that the case should be one in which the inventor had not been sufficiently rewarded. But who are to be the judges whether the invention is so meritorious as to deserve prolongation? One Judge, or one body of Judges, may think an invention very meritorious and deserving of prolongation, while another Judge or another body of Judges might be of the contrary opinion. Again, who is to tell whether the patent has sufficiently rewarded the inventor or not? I am afraid that in practice the result of holding out the expectation that the patent will be prolonged if the patentee has not been sufficiently rewarded is that if the patentee has not made much during the first 10 years of his patent, he takes good care during the next two or three years not to do anything which may alter that state of things—the doctrine acts as a premium on inactivity during the last two or three years of a patent; and can your Lordships imagine anything more calculated to unsettle the trade of the country than this? Here is a patent which, perhaps, deeply interests many of the manufacturers of the country, because, as long as it exists, no one but the patentee can use the invention. The patent is about to terminate, and a number of manufacturers would erect buildings and extend their machinery in order to work the invention; but they are afraid to do so because there may be a prolongation of the patent, which would render all their additional buildings and their extended machinery useless. The consequence is that during the later years of a patent trade becomes paralyzed in respect of that particular article. There is another practical objection to prolongation, though not, perhaps, so formidable a one as that to which I have just alluded. It appears to me that this system of prolongation is a violation of the contract made between the inventor and the State. The granting of a patent is justifiable only on the ground of expediency. The State says to the inventor—"If you have applied your ingenuity to this particular invention, and will explain how it is to be carried into effect, we will give you a monopoly of it for 14 years." The inventor is willing to take the monopoly on those terms, and work his invention. If, after the 14 years have expired, you prolong the monopoly, you give the inventor what he never bargained for. On those grounds the Government are of opinion that the recommendation of the Royal Commission should be acted upon, and that there should be no prolongations of patents beyond the 14 years for which they are granted.

I now come to a question of deep interest, and one surrounded with difficulty—I mean the subject of licences. Those who are for maintaining the Patent Laws think, nevertheless, that something ought to be done in regard to granting licences under patents; and those who are opposed to these laws think that if they are to be maintained, the granting of licences should be compulsory. I know there is an objection taken to this by those who say, with some show of plausibility—"What right have you to dictate to a man what he shall do with his own property?" But I think there is a fallacy in that. If you give a patent right to an inventor, unaccompanied by any condition, nothing can be more unjust than to annex a condition subsequently: but a patentee has no right to prevent any other person from using his invention, except that which the State confers on him; and the whole question is—On what terms should you confer that right on him? If the State thinks proper to make a stipulation at the time it confers that right, I do not see how any argument based on the violation of property can effect that stipulation; and I believe that a condition of this kind is by no means new, because in Letters Patent now granted the patentee and his executors and administrators are bound to supply, or cause to be supplied, for Her Majesty's service all such articles of the invention as they may be required to supply by the officers or commissioners administering the Department of the service for the use of which the same shall be required. We know that within the last few weeks the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, in prolonging the patent of Mr. Henry for rifle barrels, annexed this condition to the prolongation, that these barrels or arms should be supplied to any person who might require them. Now, my Lords, let me ask your attention to what is thought of this question by those who are really the best competent to judge of the feeling of manufacturers upon the subject. The Royal Commissioners considered the matter, and stated the arguments on the one side and on the other, and took a great deal of evidence in reference to it; but the Commissioners did not arrive at a conclusion that they could recommend any compulsory system of licensing. The Select Committee of the House of Commons came to an opinion upon the point. The Committee was a strong one—and I observe that there were upon it many Members who were interested in manufactures, and one who was opposed to the granting of patents. They came to the conclusion that all Letters Patent should have the following conditions inserted in them:—That the manufacture should be carried into operation within a reasonable time within the United Kingdom, so as to supply the demand for the article upon reasonable terms; that licences should be granted by the patentee on fair conditions, such conditions to be determined in the event of disagreement by the Commissioners, due regard being had to the exigencies of foreign competition. I find that the same subject was considered in a very interesting debate at the Vienna International Congress, and a Resolution to the same effect as that to which I have just referred in favour of licences was come to by a majority of 42 as against 17. Well, that being the state of things, I think your Lordships will not fail to observe that it shows that the desire for a provision of this kind comes from the very persons from whom you might have expected opposition, if opposition were to arise. If your Lordships consider the question of licences, I think you will arrive at the conclusion that there may be a considerable difference between one kind of invention and another as regards the subject of requiring licences to be granted. It may well be that the manufacturer of a particular patented article could manufacture that article to such an extent and in such quantities as to supply the whole community, and without any interruption of trade arising from any want of supply. But it is altogether different when the patented invention is part of a process. Let me illustrate what I mean by a reference to a patent of that kind. Your Lordships probably observed, as I did the other day, in one of the ordinary sources of information, mention made as to a discovery in the manufacture of glass. The discovery was said to have been made by a person who was not a glass manufacturer;—and I believe few of those discoveries are made by persons in the trade or art itself. A farmer found out that glass could be made much less brittle in the course of its manufacture by cooling it in oil in place of water, and the consequence, it is said, is that glass can be manufactured much more tough or less brittle than it was before. Now, assuming that to be so—I do not know whether it is or not—and a patent taken out for an invention of that kind, what would be the consequences? It is an invention connected with a process in a particular trade carried on in all parts of the country. If such an invention were made and were found to be as valuable as is suggested, the consequence would be that practically no person would desire to have glass of any other manufacture, and yet no one manufacturer could possibly supply the whole country. Not only that, but if he were able to do so it would suspend the operations of the whole glass manufactories throughout the country—assuming that the patentee insisted on manufacturing himself, and refused to grant licences for the use of the process. That is a case in which a whole trade would be injured and crippled if licences to use the invention were not granted. These considerations, my Lords, have led us to the conclusion that the recommendation which has been made ought to be acceded to; and we propose that there should be a condition upon all patents granted after the commencement of the Act, in consequence of which they should be liable at any time after the expiration of two years from their date to be recalled upon either of two grounds—either that the patentee fails to use or put in practice, either by himself or his licencees in this country, the patented article to a reasonable extent—proof to the contrary lying on him—so that the patent may not lie dormant, unused, and unexercised, or be a patent which, having been taken out here, he puts in practice abroad; and, secondly, if it is made to appear to the Tribunal that in order to insure a proper supply of the article to the public, or proper means for using the invention by the public licencees are necessary, and the patentee fails to grant licences on terms which the Tribunal under all the circumstances may think reasonable. I am aware that that provision casts upon the Tribunal a task of some difficulty—namely, the ascertaining of what are reasonable terms; but persons best competent to judge of that matter are of opinion that it is a difficulty which can be surmounted, and that if we provide a system of licences it will go far to remove one of the present objections to the granting of patents.

I pass now, my Lords, to a proposal which relates to the form in which patents can be revoked or recalled. At present that can only be done by a cumbersome process, and a worthless patent may be used for the purpose of extortion or embarrassment. We propose to substitute for the present dilatory and cumbersome proceeding by which alone it can be recalled, a petition to the Lord Chancellor upon any of the grounds on which petitions can at present be revoked—want of knowledge, want of utility, or upon the two special grounds I have referred to—which special grounds cannot, however, be alleged until the expiration of two years from the granting of the patent.

I now, my Lords, come to another subject, one of some difficulty and great interest. I mean the question of foreign inventions, and what is to be done with them in this country. The theory of the Statute of Monopolies and the construction put upon it was this:—There are to be no patents except for new manufactures within this realm. In the construction of that statute it has been held to be the law that any manufacture brought or introduced into this realm, if it was not used here before, was new within the realm, and that the person holding it was the inventor. So that if one of your Lordships in the course of foreign travel saw any machine or process which you had reason to believe was new, you might on your return to this country describe the nature of the invention, and would be entitled to receive a patent in respect of it. There is no doubt that in old times, when travel was not common and when intercourse between countries was not large, it was a very good thing to induce or bribe persons to discover what was being done in other countries and to bring home the result; but I think your Lordships will be of opinion that there is not much necessity for that kind of incentive to discovery in the present day—we know very well what is done in that way in other countries. The evil of the system is this:—There has arisen under the doctrine of law I have referred to this state of things—perhaps I ought not to say that it is actually done, for I might be called upon for distinct proofs, but I will, at all events, say it is supposed to be done and may be done. It may be that there are persons, agents of people in this country, who in foreign countries are on the watch for new inventions and discoveries for which patents are about to be applied; they learn the nature of them, and by telegraph or post transmit the particulars to their principals here, who, to use a common expression, “snap” the patent here before the real inventor can come over here and obtain one for himself. And, again, there are persons on the watch for the publication of patents abroad, and if any person has taken out a patent in the United States, or France, or Germany, and has not taken the precaution at the same time to apply for a patent here, some of those agents transmit the account of the invention home as quickly as possible, and a patent is thus obtained for it in this country. The consequence is, I find, that in 1872 no less than 890 patents were granted in this country to persons who, on the face of their applications, profess that they were communications from abroad; and in the year 1873 there were 870 applications of this kind. Upon this subject we have an almost perfect unanimity of opinion. The Royal Commission express an unanimous opinion that these communications should not be made the subject of future patents. The Committee of the House of Commons express a similar opinion. The International Congress of Vienna were of the same opinion: and so far as I know every country that grants patents, except our own, declines to grant patents for foreign inventions, except to the foreign patentees. We have, indeed, a provision in our law that if a patent is taken out here for any invention which forms the subject of a patent in a foreign country that patent must fall as soon as the foreign patent expires. But we propose that no patent should be granted in future for a communicated invention, and that if a patent has been granted for a foreign invention it should not be granted here except to the inventor himself, and not to him unless he applies for it within a limited time in this country. This change will, I think, commend itself to your Lordships upon every ground of fairness and equity. There is a theory which has spread a little abroad, and has been brought before me by deputations—some persons are calling out for an “international” system of patent rights. I do not myself understand, and I am not sure that these persons understand, what is meant by that phrase. There appears to be some idea that, if a foreign country should issue a particular patent, the title should be communicated and should be received by other countries, and that the patentee should then be entitled to an absolute monopoly in every other country. That, however, would be absolutely impossible. A patent must be granted in any country with regard to the novelty of its invention in that country. But suppose this country granted a patent, could we undertake to say that the invention was a novelty in Russia, in Germany, or in the United States? And if this country took upon itself to determine that the invention was a novelty in those countries, is there any chance that those countries would accept our decision? That is the view taken of patents in all other countries. If it were once held that a patent should pass through all other countries and become a monopoly in all those countries, there could be no more fatal gift to any inventor, because he would have to show before the patent would be granted that his invention was not only new in this country, but new in all other parts of the world—which it would be impossible for anyone to do. If, however, it is meant that all civilized countries are to be invited to grant patents on similar terms, and that the procedure is to be assimilated in all countries, that may be a practicable or possible thing, although it does not concern us much on what terms other countries may grant patents.

I now pass from the subject of foreign inventions. I regret to detain your Lordships at such length, yet the subject is of interest to so many persons that I do not like to omit anything essential. I now come to ask your Lordships to observe what we propose to do in a matter of considerable interest, and that is the position of the Crown in this country in regard to patent rights. The history of the position of the Crown on this subject is a very curious one. I was too much accustomed when at the Bar to deal with patent cases to have any doubt whether this was an open question. In every patent that is issued it is said that the patent shall be void unless the patentee agrees to supply all that might be wanted for the service of the Crown. What is the meaning of that proviso if the Crown is free to use the subject of the invention without remonstrance on the part of the patentee? The Crown, however, found itself so hampered with the claims made by inventors for inventions of very little merit, that they determined eight or nine years ago to try this question. The Court of Queen's Bench thereupon decided that the Crown was not bound by Letters Patent, and that the Crown was free to use any invention which was useful to any Department of the public service. That must be assumed to be good law: but the effect of such a decision is very serious. I will take inventions relating to ordnance, to great guns or ammunition. These are inventions in regard to which the only possible customer is the Crown—there is no one else in this country who wants such articles; and therefore it is merely a question whether the inventor shall apply to the Crown in this country or apply to foreign Governments. If you make it absolutely useless to take out patents here for inventions of that kind, you drive an inventor to conceal his invention in this country and to take it to a foreign country where he may get some reward for it. The policy of such a law may well be doubted. But, on the other hand, I am fully alive to the importance of the Crown being enabled to avail itself of any inventions necessary for the service of the country, free and untrammelled by delay arising from claims that may be unfounded. The obligation of the Crown to provide for the defence of the country is so paramount that if it were necessary that litigation should be settled before the invention were used, the State might be so hampered that serious injury might be done to the public service. Under these circumstances, what ought to be done?—because the state of the law is such that it can hardly be left in its present condition. The Royal Commission took evidence both as to the Army and Navy, and their recommendation was this—

“That in all patents hereafter to be granted, a proviso shall be inserted to the effect that the Crown shall have the power to use any invention therein patented without previous licence or consent of the patentee, subject to the payment of a sum to be fixed by the Treasury.”

I observe that the Gentleman who represented the War Office before the Royal Commission gave it as his opinion that such compensation as the patentee might claim should be settled by the Treasury. We propose to adopt that course, and to provide that there shall be no general exception on the part of the Crown from the obligations of patents; but that, on the other hand, any Department of the public service shall be at liberty to use an invention on terms which, if they cannot be arranged between the Department and the patentee, shall be settled by the Treasury.

There is another subject of considerable importance—I mean the expense of obtaining patents. There has been a demand for lowering the fees on patents—which your Lordships will remember I stated to be £5 at first, £20 at the end of six months, £50 at the end of the third year, and £100 at the end of the seventh year. The testimony against reducing the fees appears to me to be overwhelming. The intervals afford opportunities to patentees to consider whether it is worth while to continue their patents or not. If a patent has run two or three years, and it is worth while to continue it, it is also worth while paying what is required. If a patent runs for seven years, no doubt it is worth even the larger fee required. The testimony against reducing the patent fees appears to me to be overwhelming. While the Royal Commissioners differed in their opinions on some points, they expressed a unanimous opinion on this, and they said they did not find the cost excessive, nor the method of payment inconvenient, but they recommended that patent fees should not be made to contribute to the general expenditure of the State until every reasonable requirement of the Patent Office has been satisfied. The Committee of the House of Commons must be taken to have been of the same opinion. There was a division in the Committee on a Motion made to this effect—that the cost of obtaining patents was needlessly high, and the division was 8 against and 3 for the Motion. It is customary with inventors and manufacturers in this country to refer to the example of the United States. I have been told that there the system is very much better than ours, and that we should endeavour if possible to conform ours to it; particularly in two features—it is said that the cost of obtaining patents is much less there than here, and that in the United States there is an efficient staff to conduct examinations previously to the granting of patents. I quite agree that the United States has a very remarkable staff indeed; and your Lordships may be interested to hear something about it. I have here the Act of Congress, by which it is enacted that the officers and employés of the Patent Office shall consist of one Commissioner of Patents, one Assistant Commissioner, and three Examiners-in-Chief, to be appointed by the President; 1 chief clerk, 1 Examiner in charge of interferences, 22 Principal Examiners, 22 first Assistant Examiners, 22 second Assistant Examiners, 1 Librarian, 1 machinist, 5 clerks of class four, 6 of class three, 50 of class two, 45 of class one, and 1 messenger and purchasing clerk; and besides these, the Secretary may appoint such additional clerks of classes two and one, copyists of drawings, female copyists, skilled labourers, labourers, and watchmen as may from time to time be required. I cannot at all aspire to a staff of that kind, and those who expect us to imitate the United States' Patent Office in this respect must be disappointed. Your Lordships will be surprised to hear the number of patents issued by the United States. I said that we must be an inventive people when we registered 4,300 patents yearly; but in the United States there are yearly 18,000 applications, and of these 13,000 are granted. The United States' tariff for patents seems to consist of many different items, so that it sometimes takes 15 or 16 American patents to cover an invention that would be covered by one English patent. Take, for instance, Mr. Saxby's interlocking signal; it is said that 14 American patents would be required for it:—so that we must not be led away by what appears to be the expense of granting only one patent in the United States. What is the result of the system in the United States? Is it so very excellent? Does the employment of such a large staff, and the adoption of such a prolific system of granting patents work advantageously? One of the Commissioners, in his last Report says, that each Examiner in charge of a class now works entirely without supervision, and the result is that very many applications are hastily and carelessly examined. In 1871, a patent was granted for packing ground hops in air-tight cases. Air-tight cases are not a new invention; and the Commissioner says—"Why such a patent was granted is beyond my comprehension. A mere child could put anything in a bottle, and cover the cork with sealing wax." Another patent was granted for making shovels of cast iron ;—surely that is not new. The Commissioner says—"It is a matter of astonishment to me that such patents are ever granted, and of greater astonishment that extensions are favourably reported upon by the Examiner." These are examples of the kind of patents granted under this system, which is so much commended. And observe what occurs under the system. Your Lordships will have experienced the inconvenience of opening envelopes fastened with a seal ; an ingenious American took out a patent for attaching a short string to the corner, by means of which the envelope may be torn open. I have seen cartridges made upon that plan before ; still it is a device which it is thought worth while to patent in America. But invention did not stop there ; another man, of whose ingenuity it is impossible to speak too highly, took out a patent for tying a knot at the end of the string hanging out of the envelope. As against the system of granting patents in America, and the consequences of it, I think the recommendations of the Royal Commission proceed upon the true ground. The fees which we have now are not too high. I hope Parliament will also be of opinion that they ought not to be made a source of revenue to the country, or that, at all events, they should, in the first instance, be appropriated to the maintenance of a proper Patent Office and Museum. The first demand upon the fees should be for a Museum of Patents. I am bound to say that from all I have heard of the Patent Museum at Washington, it furnishes an example we may well imitate. I believe that both the building and the arrangement of the contents are worthy of the highest praise, and I am sorry to think that at present we can have very little chance of competing with it. I would speak in the highest terms of the arrangement of the Patent Office in Southampton Buildings, and of the accommodation which is provided there in the way of indices, and a library and reading-room ; but when I turn to the Patent Museum at South Kensington, I look with astonishment on our position. The last Report of the Royal Commission sets out a Memorial to the Treasury, presented in 1858, to which is attached my name as one of the Law Officers of the Crown and one of the Commissioners of Patents. The Memorial enters largely into the necessity for proper accommodation for the Patent Museum ; it sets forth that it is necessary to have a new building to house models of inventions which are lying scattered over the country, which have been constructed at great expense for legal and other purposes, for which the owners have no present use, and which they would gladly give to the nation if arrangements were made for placing them so that the public could have free and constant access to them. The Memorial further suggested the appropriation of a site at South Kensington. Your Lordships will agree it is important that a Patent Museum should be put upon the best possible footing. I believe nothing can be more conducive to the technical instruction of the people of this country than presenting them with a well-arranged museum of patent models to which they can have proper access, with proper explanations, so that they may be able to trace the progress of manufactures with reference both to patented inventions and to applications that were not granted. The Memorial of 1858 has not been acted upon to this day. What we call a Patent Museum is really a patent warehouse ; there is a store in the South Kensington Museum, where there is no room, where there is no light, where there is no arrangement, and where no person can examine a model—and that is termed a Patent Museum. I am happy to be able to inform your Lordships that within the last few days arrangements have been made by the Treasury for obtaining adequate space in the building immediately behind the site on which the Natural History Museum is being erected, and here the models now in the possession of the Patent Commissioners may be arranged and exhibited in such a way that the public can have convenient access to them.

Your Lordships are aware how closely related is the subject of patents with the subject of the copyright of designs. The system of copyright of designs has hitherto been under the management of the Board of Trade. The arrangement now made is to transfer it to the Patent Commissioners. It will be more properly under their care, and considerable compression can then be made in the staff of the two Departments. In addition to that, there is a subject which has occupied the attention of Parliament—I mean the registration of trade marks. At different times, measures on that subject have been produced; but it has now become peculiarly pressing for a particular reason—one foreign country at least—Germany—I am told has declined to give protection in its Courts to English trade marks, unless those seeking protection can show that their trade marks have been registered in this country, and thus acquired a status and authority they can recognize. Manufacturers are much alarmed at this, and call loudly for a system of registration of trade marks. A Bill will be introduced by the Board of Trade in the other House for the registration of trade marks; and, if passed, the registration of trade marks will be placed under the Commissioners for the Registration of Patents. I will only add that if your Lordships approve the Bill which I now lay on the Table, and pass it into law, it will produce this further advantage—it sweeps away every other statute on the subject of patents, except that all-sacred clause in the Act of Monopolies, which no person would have the courage to interfere with; and, in the four corners of this measure will be contained the whole law on the subject of Patents. My Lords, I beg leave to move that the Bill be now read a first time.

Bill for consolidating with Amendments the Acts relating to Letters Patent for Inventions presented by the Lord Chancellor.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, after the remarkable speech we have just heard, I wish to say one or two words. I think all your Lordships must feel grateful to the noble and learned Lord for having introduced so early a Bill concerning which no party feeling can exist, gone so thoroughly into the whole of this important subject, and given a description so singularly lucid of the state of the law, and particularly of past legislation on the matter. I must also acknowledge the moderation—I may say, the judicial character—of his summary of the opinions of different parties with regard to the principles and application of the Patent Law. The noble and learned Lord has given so clear a statement of the contents of the Bill that probably we shall not have much to learn from reading it. So far as I apprehend, the chief points are these—the Bill provides that there shall be a sufficient examination of patents before being granted; and this will be done by the addition of five unpaid Commissioners, by the appointment of two, three, or four paid Examiners and a certain number of Referees—I do not think the noble and learned Lord stated the number, and whether they will be paid or not.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: They are unlimited.

EARL GRANVILLE: It provides for complete and defined specifications, their being subject to the criticism of the public before the patent is valid. And it simplifies the appeal in either case of the grant or rejection of a patent. It also puts an end to the introduction of patents in this country for inventions already in operation in other places, and it prohibits the prolongation of patents beyond 14 years. It provides for a system of compulsory licenses. The provision also of a proper place and building as a Patent Museum is a most important object. I do not mean now to make any remarks on the Bill; but I take this opportunity of saying that it is a matter which I trust will be fully discussed in this House. The noble and learned Lord referred to two or three Blue Books on the subject;—I may mention the evidence taken before the Committee of your Lordships' House in 1851 as also worthy of reference; and I would take leave to suggest that the noble and learned Lord would consider before the second reading whether it would not be well to send the Bill to a Select Committee, not for the purpose of delay, but solely with a view to arrive at sound conclusions on the subject.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, that at any rate the speech of the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack had completely established one fact—that the present Patent Law ought not and could not be maintained. But while that was evident, it was by no means equally clear that the law on so difficult and complicated a subject could be easily settled and to the satisfaction of so many conflicting opinions. He would defer any general observations on the Bill till the second reading—he would only say now, that if they were going to make a Patent Museum he did not see why, instead of accumulating everything of the kind at South Kensington it should not be placed at Manchester or Birmingham, or some great inventive, industrial, and manufacturing centre where it would be readily accessible to those engaged in the arts and manufactures of the country. Their Lordships, he was sure, were grateful to the noble and learned Lord for all he had stated to them; but there were some points on which he might wish further explanation. A man thought he had an idea and he must take out a patent, not for anything he had made or done, but for an idea. When he was at the Admiralty an inventor claimed a patent, and his specification included the use of various materials, such as cork, india-rubber, in connection with iron for the construction of ships, but he had made nothing. It was only by the intervention of the Law Officers that that unreasonable claim was set aside. The person who invented those little perforations which separate postage-stamps went to the House of Commons, and a Committee gave him £2,000 instead of a patent. An ingenious gentleman soon afterwards came to him and suggested that instead of round perforations they should be made oval in form, which he thought would be much more convenient. He recommended him to go to the House of Commons, who would no doubt reward him for his ingenuity. The patent screw-propeller was at first square at the corner, but it occurred to an ingenious person that the corner might be cut off, and for that he obtained a patent. So it would be constantly. What he desired to press was that a patent should be granted not for anything that existed in idea only, but for something actually done and workable. He was afraid the noble and learned Lord's experts would not answer the purpose. The difficulty was to find men who could judge of a patent beforehand.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in reply, said, that to grant a patent for an idea would be quite absurd, and one of the duties of the Examiners would be to ascertain whether the invention for which the patent was sought came within the subject-matter of the Statute of Monopolies—which clearly an idea could not do. Besides, the patent might be repealed if it were not brought into use within a given number of years after it was granted. The noble Duke (the Duke of Somerset) had said that the Referees would not be able to judge whether an invention would be useful to the world or not. That was one of the things which they would not have to judge. He had carefully excluded the question of utility, because nothing but experience could decide whether a thing would prove useful or not. With regard to the question of the experts, to which the noble Duke also referred, what he proposed was that there should be a list prepared with the assistance of the Board of Trade, and re-settled every two years; that this list should be divided into panels, consisting of persons versed in some branch of science—some in chemistry, some in physics, and some in mechanics—and that along with the Examiners to whom the question of the patent was referred should be associated pro hac vice one or two out of those panels who should be paid, not by salaries, but for the particular service on which they were engaged. The manner in which they would be selected would be determined by rules.

MINUTES.]—NEW WRIT ISSUED—For Stroud, v. Henry Robert Brand, esquire, void Election.

NEW MEMBER SWORN—Hon. David Robert Plunket, for The College of the Holy Trinity, Dublin.

SELECT COMMITTEE—Public Accounts, nominated.
PUBLIC BILL—*Ordered—First Reading—Adulteration of Food and Drugs [62].

LABOUR LAWS COMMISSION—FINAL REPORT.—QUESTION.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he can inform the House when the final Report of the Royal Commission on the Labour Laws will be presented?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: I have communicated with the Secretary to the Labour Laws Commissioners, and I am informed by him that I may expect the Report of the Commissioners to be laid upon the Table of the House some time in the course of next week.

MUSEUM OF PATENTS AND INVENTIONS—SOUTH KENSINGTON.

QUESTION.

MR. MUNDELLA asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether he is able to inform the House of the decision of the Government with respect to the removal of the Museum of Patents and Inventions?

LORD HENRY LENNOX, in reply, said, the Government had decided upon providing a suitable site at South Kensington. The exact nature and extent of that site he would explain in detail when he asked the House to vote money for the purpose of carrying out the decision of the Government.

PRIVILEGE—OFFENSIVE LANGUAGE REFERRING TO IRISH MEMBERS.

QUESTION.

MR. SULLIVAN said: I beg to ask the hon. and learned Member for Frome (Mr. Lopes)—and not, as has been erroneously printed on the Notice Paper, the hon. and learned Member for Tyrone—Whether he is correctly reported in "The Times," September 11th, 1874, as having used the following words, referring to certain Members of this House:—

"What was the present position of the Liberal Party? In the House of Commons they were deserted by their Chief, who, by his fitful appearance in the House, disappointed their hopes. They were allied to a disreputable Irish band, whose watch-word in the House was Home Rule and Repeal of the Union?"

MR. LOPES: I had hoped that when the hon. Member described me as the hon. and learned Member for Tyrone he had intended it as a compliment to me. In answer to the Question he has put to me, I beg to state that, so far as my memory can be trusted in respect of words alleged to have been uttered by me six months ago, in an after-dinner speech, on the occasion of a great and successful Conservative demonstration, I say, so far as my memory can be trusted, I believe, that, in effect, I did use the expressions which have been attributed to me. Sir, if it is any satisfaction to the hon. Member for Louth, who appears to be of a somewhat sensitive temperament, I unhesitatingly say that I never for one moment intended to be personally disrespectful to the Irish Members who sit in this House; but, Sir, I meant then—what I repeat without qualification now—that, in my humble opinion, the advocacy of measures calculated to impair the integrity of the United Kingdom is politically "not creditable." Now, Sir, I use the words, "not creditable," advisedly; and if the hon. Member for Louth, in his leisure moments, will do me the favour to refer to that great authority, Johnson's Dictionary, in three volumes, by Mr. Todd, published in 1827—he will find that "not creditable" is absolutely the only meaning assigned to the adjective "disreputable."

MR. SULLIVAN: I wish distinctly to ask the hon. and learned Member whether he withdraws the language "a disreputable Irish band, whose watch-word in the House was Home Rule and Repeal of the Union?" Are the words withdrawn or not?—As no answer is given, I beg to give Notice that on Monday I shall call attention to this matter on a Question of Privilege.

FRIENDLY SOCIETIES BILL.

QUESTION.

MR. DILLWYN (for Mr. DODDS) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he will postpone the Second Reading of the Friendly Societies Bill for a short time, in order that sufficient time may be allowed for its provisions to be read and considered in the Country?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, that the Bill was almost identical with the Bill that was introduced and read a second time last Session. Some few alterations were made in it, being almost entirely in the direction of recommendations of persons interested in these societies. As regarded the principle of the Bill, it had been so completely before the country, and so well considered, that there could be no reason for delaying the second reading. He admitted there were a good many questions which might arise in Committee, and he therefore proposed that a considerable time should elapse between the second reading and the subsequent stage. Taking the second reading on Monday, he would not fix the Committee till the 8th of March.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not press the Bill so hastily, and in saying that he was expressing the feeling of many hon. Members. He was sure opposition would be offered to proceeding with the Bill on Monday.

THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

HER MAJESTY'S ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS.

THE COMPTROLLER OF THE HOUSEHOLD (Lord HENRY SOMERSET) reported Her Majesty's Answer to the Address, as follows:—

"I return you My heartfelt thanks for your loyal and dutiful Address.

"I rely firmly, as heretofore, on your careful consideration of the Measures that may be submitted to you, and I will willingly co-operate with you in promoting whatever is conducive to the happiness and contentment of My People."

STROUD WRIT.

MOTION TO ISSUE NEW WRIT.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That Mr. Speaker do issue his Warrant to the Clerk of the Crown to make out a New Writ for the Election of a Member to serve in this present Parliament for the Borough of Stroud, in the room of Henry Robert Brand, esquire, whose Election has been determined to be void."—(Mr. Adam.)

MR. CHARLES LEWIS, on rising to move an Amendment, expressed a hope that if any hon. Member thought a renewal of the discussion of the important question involved in this Motion was rather hard upon the House, and somewhat unauthorized on his part, this feeling would soon be dissipated. Before the previous debate he had unavoidably had little opportunity of becoming acquainted with the precedents which bore upon the subject. He acknowledged, indeed, that he had been quite unprepared to find the question taken up on the constitutional grounds on which it was debated. Since then he had had an opportunity of fortifying himself with precedents which he hoped would be regarded as decisive. He had, however, to point out that the Motion which he now put to the House was a totally different one from that which he presented on the former occasion. He now asked the House to consider whether it ought not, at all events, to pause till it had read the evidence taken at the trial of the recent Election Petition before authorizing the issue of a new writ. He had to ask the indulgence of the House while he referred to a matter personal to himself. It would be in the recollection of the House that after he had replied on the debate the other night, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) took what was a perfectly lawful, but, at the same time, a very unusual course in alluding to the precedents which he (Mr. Lewis) had made in his speech, and stated to the House that, on his investigation of the Stafford case, he found that it told against his (Mr. Lewis's) argument rather than in favour. That right hon. Gentleman alluded to the three Bills of Disfranchisement which were presented to the House of Lords, and stated that directly the Disfranchisement Bill in regard to Stafford was thrown out, the writ was issued. The right hon. Gentleman was reported—he believed correctly—to have used these words in the previous debate—

"In 1836 it (the Disfranchisement Bill) was introduced for the third time, and carried by the consent of almost the whole House, but it was rejected by the House of Lords; and as soon as it had been rejected, a writ was moved for. So that the precedent, instead of supporting the hon. and learned Member, told the other way."

Now, the facts were these—The Disfranchisement Bill in the case of Stafford was thrown out by the House of Lords on the 29th of July, 1836. The House of Commons then took the usual course of having the Journals of the House of Lords searched, and the matter was entered on the Journals of that House on the 11th of August. It was true that on the 11th of August the writ was moved for; but instead of its being granted, the fact was, that it was suspended by the House of Commons. Now, nothing more unfortunate to him and to the cause he was endeavouring to advocate

could have occurred than that incorrect statement of the right hon. Gentleman made just before the division the other evening, and he believed it had an important influence on the votes of many hon. Members. So strong was the opinion of the House, that although the Disfranchisement Bill had been thrown out, it had a discretion to suspend the writ, that a Motion was carried by 45 to 5 in favour of suspending the writ until 10 days after the commencement of the next Session; and then, on the writ being moved for, it was carried by the narrow majority of 1 — or by 152 to 151. Voting in that minority of 151 they had some men of great distinction in that House—among others Sir George Grey, Lord Ebury, Mr. Bernal, Sir Francis Baring, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Liskeard (Mr. Horsman), the late Lord Taunton, the present Duke of Somerset, and Sir Harry Verney. Having been told the other night by the Prime Minister and the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) that he was asking the House to take a most unconstitutional course, and one interfering with the liberties of the people, he referred to the Stafford case as justifying him, not only in the Motion he made the other evening, but in now asking the House so far to reconsider the question as to stay its hand until the evidence taken at Stroud had been printed. It had been urged, and it would probably be repeated, that when the Election Petitions Acts passed, that House gave over the staff of authority to the Election Judge. He hoped that argument would be recollected when they had the Continuance Bill presented to them in the course of that Session. Knowing what was the temper of the House, he doubted whether, when it passed the Election Petitions Act of 1868, it intended to surrender one of its long-established and most cherished privileges into the hands of one man, however eminent, from whose decision there was no appeal, who was as amenable to bias as any of his fellow-creatures, who was liable to make mistakes, and who had none of the infallibility which was imputed to, but never claimed by, the noble Lord who sat near him (Lord Robert Montagu). According to the argument used the other night, they had only to ask Mr. Speaker for what day he would fix the election, and although a Motion was made in that House for the issue of the writ, they would be doing an unconstitutional thing if they voted against it. Had they not really the same privilege now as they had before, or was the thing a mere empty formality, like the congé d'élire in the case of the election of a Bishop? They had to go back, not to the Election Petitions Act of 1868, but to the Corrupt Practices Act of 1852, in order to test that question. The Corrupt Practices Act of 1852 was the Act under which Commissions of Inquiry into electoral corruption were initiated. It was then enacted that upon the Report of an Election Committee that corrupt practices had prevailed, or that there was reason to believe they had prevailed, then, on an Address to the Crown from both Houses of Parliament, a Commission would issue. The only alteration made by the Act of 1868, was to substitute an Election Judge for an Election Committee. There was no other difference whatever. There was nothing in the Act, or in the form of the Act, in any way infringing on that discretion of the House of Commons which had been exercised over and over again both before and since the passing of the Act of 1852. But it was said that because in extreme cases of corruption, there was to be a proceeding taken previous to disfranchisement, in cases of less aggravated corruption the House had no discretion to suspend the writ for a day or for a Session of Parliament. It was of the most vital importance in the consideration of this question, to bear in mind that Government itself had in analogous circumstances taken the very course which he now recommended. In 1859, there was a Petition against the two Members for Gloucester. The two Members were unseated, a Commission of Inquiry was issued, and the Report was laid on the Table of the House on the 24th of January, 1860. He entreated the attention of the House to this fact, that not by the action of any private Member, but by the interference of the Government of the day—the Government of Lord Palmerston—after that Report was presented, there not being a sufficient case for disfranchisement, and no proposal of disfranchisement, the House suspended the writ for two whole years. He would refer to the volume of Hansard for the year

1861, in which the late Mr. Thomas Duncombe—who always contended that, however much bribery might be proved against a constituency, they had a right to a writ instante, unless disfranchisement was proposed—was reported to have asked the then Home Secretary (Sir George Lewis)—

“Whether the Government intended to bring in a Bill in regard to Gloucester and Wakefield.”—[3 Hansard, clxiii. 1070.]

Sir George Lewis replied that—

“It was not the intention of the Government to bring in any measure with respect to those boroughs; that the course they had taken had been taken deliberately; and that, as far as the Government were concerned, they intended to withhold the issue of the writ during the present Parliament.”—[Ibid.]

That, he admitted, was not after the passing of the Election Petitions Act of 1868; but he challenged any legal Member of the House to say whether the effect of the Act of 1868 had been greater or higher than this—that for the old Election Committee of five Members was substituted an Election Judge, who had all their powers, statutory and otherwise. He now came to another branch of the argument. Supposing there had been any alteration made by the conjoint effect of the Act of 1852 and the Act of 1868, was it to be solemnly maintained that, when on the face of the Report of a Judge, the trial of an Election Petition had not been complete, but had been interrupted by the withdrawal of the person petitioned against, and the hand of the Election Judge appointed by statute had been paralyzed by the abstention of the parties, therefore the House was precluded from proceeding any further in the matter, unless it was proposed to disfranchise the borough? He was in a position to show that in neither of the Petitions was the Election Judge able to make a complete inquiry. He found it stated by Baron Bramwell, in reference to the first Petition, that there was evidence of many persons having been guilty of corrupt practices at the election, but that the respondents gave up their defence, saying that they saw that the determination must go against them, and therefore certain evidence that might have been produced was not in fact produced. With respect to the second Petition, Baron Bramwell also reported that there was evidence of bribery against other persons, but that, as the respondent, Mr. Dorrington, had withdrawn from the defence of the seat, he did not think he ought to report that bribery had been proved against them. In the case of the third Petition, the Judge also reported that, as the claim for the seat had been struck out of the Petition, the evidence of corrupt practices was necessarily confined to such acts as could be proved against the respondent's party; in other words, that the petitioner had found it desirable not to press his claim to the seat, lest retaliatory evidence should be brought forward. On the face of those Reports, therefore, it appeared that not one of the three inquiries was complete, because of the action of persons who feared to allow the investigation to proceed. Under those circumstances he would, he thought, be committing an outrage on the common sense of the House if he endeavoured to press the point any further on its attention, or to lay further stress on the arguments which, in his opinion, should induce it to vote against the issue of the writ. It had, indeed, on a former night, been said that if the House intended to take any further steps against the borough of Stroud, that might be a good reason for withholding the writ; but that otherwise, no sufficient reason existed. Now, he would, he thought, be able to show that the House possessed, in the present instance, the power, under statute, to take further steps; and if ever there was a case in which the House ought to be careful to do nothing which would lead people out-of-doors to suppose that the extension of the franchise had rendered it less careful with respect to maintaining purity of election, it was that, he contended, which it was now engaged in discussing, in which, in consequence of corrupt persons having been permitted to go throughout the length and breadth of the constituency, a borough which had once been pure, and which had returned eminent persons to Parliament, had been polluted, degraded, and defiled. Unless, therefore, the House wished to impress every constituency in the Kingdom that its desire to put down bribery had been destroyed by recent events, he most earnestly implored of it to take time to deliberate on the question as to the exercise of the power which it undoubtedly possessed under the statute of 1852. By the Corrupt Practices Act of that year, which enacted that on the joint Address of both Houses, a Committee of the House of Commons might be appointed to try an Election Petition, or to inquire into the existence of corrupt practices at any election or elections, reference was made to two tribunals—the ordinary Election Committee, or a special Committee of the House appointed to inquire into those practices. Now, it would be found that under the Election Petitions Act the Judge was substituted for only one of those tribunals, and that the other had not been destroyed. The 15th section provided that, where the Judge reported that he had reason to believe that corrupt practices had extensively prevailed in any county or borough, such Report should have the same effect and be dealt with in the same manner as if the Report had been that of a Committee of the House of Commons appointed to inquire into an Election Petition. It was therefore clear that the special Committee which might even now be appointed to inquire into the existence of corrupt practices at elections, and to which he had referred, was left undealt with and undestroyed, although it was no part of his case to show whether the House ought or ought not to appoint such a special Committee in the present instance. He would, however, beg of the House to abstain from issuing the writ, in order that it might have an opportunity of carefully considering the evidence which had been given before Baron Pigott, and then it would be for the House, under the advice of its recognized Leaders, to say whether there was sufficient evidence in the course of one of the longest trials under the Act to justify its further action. He would now, with the permission of the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt), ask the House to let him read another letter. It might, of course, be objected to such a course, as it had been on a previous night, that it was below the dignity of the House to listen to what was termed “street gossip,” or to paragraphs in newspapers which were anonymous. But he had got great historic authority in favour of anonymous communications, both in and out of the House. At all events, he would go a little further than the hon. and learned Gentleman. The writer was a clergyman, and that destroyed, at all events, a little of his anonymous character. The communication was rather odd, but its very oddness of expression was perhaps in favour of its truthfulness. The writer said that the injury which had been done to trade in Stroud because of the recent election contests was fearful, inasmuch as the money had been spent on Petitions which would otherwise have gone into the pockets of the tradesmen, and that delay in the payment of their bills was frequently sought to be justified on account of the subscriptions for the purpose of Election Petitions which had to be paid, while party spirit had in many instances caused tradesmen to be deserted by their customers. Now, that was a state of things which it was only natural to expect. Then it was asserted from the front Opposition Benches that the House of Commons had no special right to deal with a case relating to the representation of the people in Parliament. The House was told the other night that for the House of Commons to act without the co-operation of the other House and the Crown would be an infringement of the liberty of the subject, and they were appealed to not to allow such a monstrosity. He (Mr. Lewis) confessed that when he heard the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Oxford the other night he was reminded of something he said out of the House not very long ago in one of those touching monologues with which he entertained his constituents when celebrating so joyfully the defeat and disaster of the party to which he belonged, and in which he claimed with his own hand and pen to have written a new page and chapter of fulfilled prophecy with regard to the disaster which had befallen his own friends. The hon. and learned Gentleman on that occasion made use of some remarkable expressions. He said that the Liberal party had suffered from too much physic—too many potions and too many pills. He went on to say that if they were again to be restored to good health they must have administered to them a few grains of the salt of common sense. He could not help thinking that one of the conditions of the success of that advice was, in the hon. and learned Gentleman's opinion, that he should himself be the head physician. But, as he now found himself not to be in that position, perhaps he would condescend to administer a few grains of common sense to the House of Commons instead of to his party. For his own part, he asked the House to decide the question on the grounds of common sense. It had the right and privilege to say that the writ should not be issued, for it was absurd to contend that it was to be bound hand and foot by the Reports of Election Judges. He did not believe that was a position, when it gave up its privilege of trying Election Petitions to the Judges, the House of Commons ever meant to occupy; and, as the Amendment which he had risen to move was a temperate and a moderate one, he trusted the House would not, by refusing to agree to it, rejoice the hearts of men who lived by bribery and corruption, and perpetuate the misery of many households in Stroud which required peace. He hoped the House by its verdict would prove that it was not careless about one of its highest and most cherished privileges, and one of its most solemn duties—the protection of the purity of our system of Parliamentary representation. The hon. and learned Gentleman concluded by moving, as an Amendment to the Motion—

“That no new Writ be issued for the Election of a Member of Parliament for the Borough of Stroud until three days after the printing and distribution among the Members of this House of the evidence taken upon the trial of the Petition against the return of the late Member which took place before Baron Pigott.”

MR. R. YORKE, in seconding the Amendment, observed, that the case of Stroud was so peculiar, that he was sure the House would re-consider the opinion it formed the other night, which was, that it should not be treated on its merits, but should be judged solely in the light of precedents. He would not attempt to go into the question of precedents. That he would leave to the legal Gentlemen on either side of the House, who were so well qualified to deal with it. But he would remark that if precedents were always to be followed in these matters, the range of the discretion of the House would be seriously curtailed. The duty of the Judge who tried an Election Petition was first to inquire into the character of the candidate, in the next case into that of individual electors; and, thirdly, into that of the constituency as a whole. In the present instance, the Judge had reported against individual electors, but he had pronounced in the candidate's favour, and had acquitted the constituency generally. Now the House of Commons had indisputably the power of issuing a Commission of Inquiry when corrupt practices were reported to prevail, and he maintained that it had also the power of suspending a writ, otherwise, as the hon. and learned Gentleman who had preceded him remarked, why was it asked that evening to say “Aye” or “No” on the question? Although it was included in the range of the Judge's duty to try the question of the general purity of a constituency, it was the interest of all parties concerned to contract the scope and minimize the amount of matter submitted to his decision. In most cases, if the Judge had the materials at all for judging of the general purity of the constituency he got them only indirectly. No sooner had the petitioner proved his case, were it only as much as direct bribery to the amount of 2s. 6d., than the defendant's counsel threw up his brief, and the whole matter, by common consent, came to an end. It was unnecessary to refer to the Reports of the Judges in the three Election Petitions at Stroud to prove that this was the case with regard to that constituency. And the case of a constituency or of individuals who had yielded to a first temptation, was very different from that of a constituency or individuals who were found again and again resorting to vicious courses. Only the other day there came before one of the Metropolitan magistrates a “young lady” who had taken something from a shop and sold it, and she was let off to come up for judgment again when called upon. Now, if she had been an habitual thief—and Stroud had, unfortunately, proved itself to be an habitually corrupt borough—the sentence would no doubt have been a severe one. Unfortunately, it seemed that the House of Commons was not very vigilant in exercising its functions, even when corrupt practices were reported to prevail in a constituency. Against the borough of Boston corrupt practices were reported in June last year, and up to the present time no action had been taken on the Report, either by the Government or any other party in the House of Commons. It thus appeared that when corrupt practices were reported, it was by no means the rule that a Commission of Inquiry should at once be issued. As to the case of Stroud, he would venture to predict that if the writ was suspended, even for a comparatively short time, it would be accepted by the inhabitants of the borough as a warning that they had nearly reached the limits of the patience of the House of Commons. He believed that the suspension of the writ, if only for a short time, would do the constituency a greater service by allowing their better feelings to re-assert themselves, than any other action that the House could possibly take. It was to be recollected that the last Reform Bill, excellent though it was in many respects, introduced a very large number of persons into constituencies such as that of Stroud, who were peculiarly amenable to temptation of the kind attending elections. Anyone who knew anything of Stroud during the past year, must be aware that for weeks together, it became the practice for men to walk about, sticking up handbills and protecting them against the other party, for wages perhaps double what they would have earned by honest labour. He had thought it right to again address the House on this subject, in the hope that at the eleventh hour it would give Stroud one more chance of redeeming its character, and he believed the strength of the case which had been brought forward by the hon. and learned Gentleman who had preceded him was sufficient to entitle him to meet with success.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "no new Writ be issued for the Election of a Member of Parliament for the Borough of Stroud until three days after the printing and distribution among the Members of this House of the evidence taken upon the trial of the Petition against the return of the late Member which took place before Mr. Baron Pigott,"—
(Mr. Charles Lewis,)

MR. CHILDERS would only remark with regard to the Amendment that while the hon. and learned Member who introduced it (Mr. Lewis) was quite prepared last Tuesday to disfranchise Stroud without reading the evidence, his proposal, now that he had been beaten, was that the writ should not be issued until the House had gone through that process. The hon. Member who seconded him had endeavoured to illustrate the different degrees of criminality in corrupt boroughs by the case of a young lady against whom there was a certain charge, but whose pleasing appearance and respectable connections had induced the magistrate to let her go back to her friends. He hardly thought the inhabitants of Stroud would feel flattered by the contrast which the hon. and learned Member had attempted to draw, involving as it did the suggestion that their appearance was displeasing and their connections disreputable. With regard to Stafford, if he had not correctly stated the facts of the case on the previous occasion he would now have apologized to the House; but he thought that when they had heard what he had to say they would find that the case of Stafford as against the proposal for suspending the writ was much stronger than he had put it. What happened on Tuesday was this. It was proved by the Solicitor General that the precedents were entirely against the course proposed to be taken by the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry, who, nevertheless, in his reply, referred a second time to the case of Stafford, as if the arguments which had been used in reference to that case were in his favour. At the end of the debate he (Mr. Childers) stated off-hand the facts in reference to Stafford, and on the present occasion the hon. and learned Member implied that he misinformed the House in one respect, by leaving it to be inferred that, the Disfranchising Bills having failed, the writ was then and there immediately issued. What he stated was that, the last of the Disfranchising Bills having failed, the writ was issued; and it did not occur to him to have to explain more minutely that the last Bill having been thrown out at the very end of one Session, the writ of election issued a few days after the commencement of the succeeding Session. The facts in relation to Stafford, stated more fully, were these. At the election in 1833, a prodigious amount of bribery was committed, and two Petitions were presented, but both fell through, so that the two Members continued to sit. Thereupon a Bill was passed to indemnify witnesses who might come forward and give evidence before a Committee which should inquire generally into the corruption of Stafford. That Committee was appointed in 1833, and at the close of its sittings reported that open, general, and systematic bribery having been proved, Stafford should, in the opinion of the Committee, cease to return Members to Parliament. The Chairman of the Committee, Sir Thomas Fremantle (now Lord Cottesloe), was instructed to bring in a Bill to disfranchise the borough. He acted upon that instruction; but the Session had, at the date of the introduction of the measure, advanced so far that the measure was not further proceeded with. The measure was re-introduced on the 11th of February in the following year and passed by the House; but on its being carried to the House of Lords their Lordships proceeded no further with it. The same fate befel a similar Bill introduced in 1835. It passed the Commons, but made no progress in the House of Lords. In 1836 it was brought in for the fourth time, and carried in the House of Commons by 53 votes to 6. It was then sent to the Lords, who for a month took no steps in reference to it. At the end of that time their Lordships appointed a Committee of Inquiry, who at the end of other two months proceeded to take evidence, and, finally, on the 29th of July, their Lordships rejected the Bill. A Motion was then carried in this House that the issue of the writ for a vacancy which had meanwhile occurred be suspended for a week to await the decision of Parliament upon a second Bill, the object of which was to disfranchise the burgesses of Stafford as distinguished from the householders and freemen—it having been proved that of the 850 burgesses no less than 700 had been bribed. That Bill was introduced in the House of Lords, and on the 4th of August was also rejected. It was then ordered that the writ should not issue until 10 days after the commencement of the following Session, the object of this being that those who had brought in the previous Bills might have an opportunity of considering and deciding whether or not they would bring in any further Bill in the following Session. On the 13th of February in the following year the question of issuing the writ was raised, and Sir Thomas Fremantle said—

“The real subject matter for their deliberation was, whether if a Bill were brought forward for the disfranchisement of Stafford, there was a reasonable prospect of carrying the Bill. If his hon. Friend the Member for Exeter”—who had moved in the matter—“was prepared to say that he was ready to bring in a Bill for the purpose, and that there was a reasonable prospect of carrying it, he (Sir Thomas Fremantle) would vote for suspending the writ until the end of this Parliament; but on the grounds on which his hon. Friend had placed the Amendment, he could not in justice to his own feelings, and in accordance with his sense of duty, vote for it. . . . The continued suspension of the writ would be inconsistent with the principles of the Constitution.”—[3 Hansard, xxxvi. 450-1.]

This was precisely what was said on Tuesday night in opposition to the proposal of the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry. When it became clear that no further Disfranchising Bill was to be introduced the writ was issued. Therefore, it seemed clear that the precedent of Stafford, which was so strongly relied on by the hon. and learned Member, was opposed to the proceeding which he asked the House to take.

MR. STAVELEY HILL said, that as the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry (Mr. Lewis) had challenged the House to draw a distinction between the state of things now existing and that prior to 1868, he would draw attention to a most important one created by the Act of 1868. He was one of those who last year thought it was desirable that the writ should be suspended with a view to other proceedings; but the House, after considering the Report of the learned Judge who tried the last Petition, did not come to that conclusion. The Act of 1852 provided that when the Committee reported that corrupt practices prevailed a Commission should issue, and the issue of the writ was suspended; the Judge under the Act of 1868 was put in the place of the Committee. The whole power of the Committee of the House of Commons had been handed over to the Election Judges; whether it had been beneficial or not he would not then stop to inquire: but the 13th section of the Act of 1868 provided that the House, when informed of the certificate of the learned Judge, should order the same to be entered on their Journals, and give the necessary directions for confirming or altering the return, or issuing a writ for a new election, or for carrying the decision into execution, as circumstances might require. The House was now completely bound hand and foot to the decision of the Judges to whom had been handed over these matters. In the present case the learned Judge had reported that there was no reason to believe that corrupt practices extensively prevailed in the borough of Stroud at the last election, and therefore he held that the House had no right to withhold the issue of the writ.

MR. FORSYTH said, that although he felt strongly inclined to support the Amendment, there were reasons why he could not do so. To adopt in that House a practice of reviewing and possibly reversing the decisions of Judges appointed to try election petitions would only have the effect of utterly destroying the authority of the tribunals created by Act of Parliament. If any such practice was to be adopted, then it would be better at once to repeal the Act under which the Judges were appointed. Let it be assumed for a moment that the House was satisfied the Judge was wrong, and ought to have decided that there was extensive corruption; he (Mr. Forsyth) said the House had no power, under the Act of Parliament, to issue any Commission at all. The Act of 1868 provided that if the Judge reported that he believed corrupt practices had extensively prevailed, that Report should have the same effect and might be dealt with in the same manner as a Report of a Committee of the House of Commons under the Act of 1852. Therefore, the Report of the Judge was to have the same effect, and no more, than a Report of a Committee under the Act of 1852. The first section of that Act enacted that when a Committee appointed to try an Election Petition reported that corrupt practices had extensively prevailed, and the Houses of Parliament presented a joint Address to the Crown for the issue of a Commission of Inquiry, then, and then only, a Commission should issue. Suppose the House came to the conclusion that extensive corruption prevailed in the borough of Stroud, the House was powerless, except to suspend the writ. It could not by law issue a Commission. No doubt it could suspend the writ. He would not go into the argument, which was fully exhausted the other night, as to the power of the House to suspend the writ; but he would say this—that the argument satisfied him there was no precedent of the House having suspended a writ unless some definite action was to be taken after the suspension had been voted by the House. The only other possible ground that could be urged for the suspension of a writ was that there was political and social excitement in the constituency. He did not believe his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Londonderry (Mr. Lewis) would be able to point to a single precedent where the House of Commons, because there was excitement in a constituency, suspended a writ. For these reasons, he should, although with reluctance, vote against the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend.

MR. MILLS said, he thought it would be simply ridiculous to waste time on a Motion to do that which the House of Commons had no power to do. But though they could not issue a Commission they had clearly the power to suspend this writ. They were told that a certain right hon. Gentleman was to appear at Stroud who would be agreeable to all parties; but he (Mr. Mills) doubted the likelihood of that now that that right hon. Gentleman's address had been published. It was a very long document, but might be compressed into one line of 10 words, and the moral of it was—"Politics not so much an object as a quiet seat." He (Mr. Mills) believed there were honest Liberals and honest Conservatives in Stroud, and he gave them credit for wanting to fight out their battle. As he thought the longer that battle was delayed the better, he should vote for the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry (Mr. Lewis) had reminded him that he pronounced an eulogium on common sense which seemed to have attracted the hon. and learned Member's attention. It was quite true that he estimated common sense very highly, and it had taught him several things. It had taught him, in the first place, that the House of Commons had better be guided by the decisions of Her Majesty's Judges, to whom they had referred these questions, rather than by the opinions of anonymous writers, even though they happened to be present. It had taught him, in the second place, that these debates gained nothing by bandying personalities. It had taught him that when they were discussing a serious question, it was better to address themselves to those things which had to do with the question rather than those which had not. In the case of Stafford, to which his right hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) had referred, the writ was suspended over and over again in the hope that the House of Lords would pass a Disfranchising Bill. As soon as that hope was dispelled, the House of Commons felt it was not at liberty to suspend the writ. The House of Commons could say to the House of Lords—"You have three times refused to pass a Disfranchising Bill, therefore we take the matter into our own hands and issue the writ." The hon. and learned Member, who was very unfortunate in his precedents, was equally inaccurate in his statement of the case of Wakefield. Now, the case of Wakefield was a peculiar one. There had been a Committee, which had reported extensive corruption. There had been a Commission, founded upon the Report of the Committee, and the writ for Wakefield was suspended from time to time for various reasons; but during the whole of that period legislation was either, in fact, going on or contemplated, which affected the issue of that writ. The first legislation which was contemplated was in the year 1860. A Motion was made for leave to bring in a Bill

"to make provision that, at the Election of Members to serve in Parliament for the city of Gloucester and Borough of Wakefield, the Electors thereof give their votes by way of Ballot," and that Motion was negatived. After that there were various other grounds of legislation alleged for suspending the Wakefield writ. Sir George Lewis, when he moved, in February, 1861, that the writ should not issue without seven days' notice, said—

"It was the intention of the Government to introduce a measure founded upon the Report of the Committee of last Session on the Corrupt Practices Act . . . and the House would decide whether the measure should be retrospective.—[3 Hansard, clxi. 247.]

That measure provided that in cases where a Commission had reported that a constituency was corrupt the writ should be suspended for five years. That was a legislative Act to give the very power which the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry called upon them to give that evening. Sir George

Lewis said that, though the Government had not introduced a Bill with a retrospective operation with respect to Gloucester and Wakefield, it would be competent for the House to make such alterations in the Bill as would give it a retrospective operation; and this was what the hon. and learned Member said was suspending the writ without the concurrence of the Legislature. On the 28th of June, 1861, Sir George Lewis said it would be competent for the House to suspend the writs for boroughs in the same position as Gloucester and Wakefield for five years, and to include those boroughs in the Bill. That Bill did not pass. In February, 1862, a new writ for Wakefield passed without opposition. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Londonderry said his Motion was different from that which he made the other night. It was really very different, and, if possible, more irregular. If they wished for the evidence, he (Sir William Harcourt) wanted to know what they were to do with it when they got it. If the hon. and learned Member wished the House to discuss that evidence, and to come to a decision the opposite of that of the Judge, he wished the House to exercise a privilege which gentlemen at the Bar did not think themselves entitled to exercise with reference to the decisions of Judges. Was the House to say that witnesses whom the Judge had seen and whom the House had not seen were credible witnesses, although the Judge said they were not; or, on the other hand, was the House to say that witnesses whom the Judge had seen and whom the House had not seen ought not to have credit given to them, although the Judge believed that they were credible? He would yield to no man in his high estimation of the House of Commons, of which they were all so proud. He believed it to be the best legislative Assembly in the world, but he believed it to be the worst judicial body you could form. The House had been of that opinion itself. He felt the scandal of these discussions and the votes to which they gave rise as long ago as the last century, when the Granville Act was passed for referring Election Petitions to the Committees of the House. The hon. and learned Member for Londonderry wanted to bring back the House to such a state of things as existed in the days of Sir

Robert Walpole. The House not being satisfied with the trial of Election Petitions by Committees had transferred the subject to the Judges. The hon. and learned Member was dissatisfied with the Judges and with the Election Petitions Act; but he (Sir William Harcourt) ventured to point out to him that, if he was dissatisfied with the Judges, the constitutional course for him to adopt would be to repeal the statute by the assent of the Legislature, and not to evade and set it aside by a Resolution of the House of Commons. Why were Money Bills sent up to the House of Lords and passed through Committee although that House had no right to alter them? The very meaning of the word "unconstitutional" was doing a thing which you might do, but which you ought not to do, if you acted in conformity with the spirit of your institutions; and it had been determined to be a part of the Constitution of this country that when a statute had been passed it could not be got rid of, except by repealing it; yet the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry asked the House of Commons to determine that one Chamber could overrule a legislative Act. What did the hon. and learned Member propose to do when the evidence had been laid before the House? The hon. Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) spoke of lawyers the other day in a not very respectful manner, and a sentiment of that kind was always sure to evoke much popular applause; but the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry now wanted to convert the House of Commons into a Court of Nisi Prius, where all the lawyers were to pull the evidence to pieces and to address the jury upon it, although he was afraid the House would not have the benefit of the summing up of the right hon. Gentleman in the Chair. The House would, in fact, be a jury summoned by the division bell and marshalled by the "Whip." That was the manner in which the hon. and learned Member appeared to think that the dignity and character of that House was to be maintained before the country. As his hon. Friend the Member for Marylebone (Mr. Forsyth) had justly remarked—"If you can go behind the Judge for one purpose, you can go behind him for all purposes." When the Judge had unseated a Member, the House of Commons might move for the evidence and re-seat him. When the Judge had declared people to be guilty of bribery, the House might move for the evidence and declare them to be not guilty. If the House could disregard the Judge's finding with respect to a constituency, it might disregard it also with reference to the voters. Therefore the litigious spirit which, as everybody so much regretted, had crept into the borough of Stroud was, under the auspices of the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry, to be introduced into the House of Commons. The hon. and learned Member for Londonderry said a case under the Election Petitions Act was just like a case under the Act of 1852, when Commissions were first authorized to be issued. But the fact was that, as soon as the Act of 1852 was passed, a warning was addressed to Parliament by one who was no longer alive, but whose opinion on such subjects would be listened to with respect in that House, and even by Members who sat on the Conservative benches. In the Canterbury case, Lord Lyndhurst said—

"It had been their object—a Constitutional and Parliamentary object—to prevent, as far as possible, the House of Commons and this House from exercising any judgment in the case of elections. And why? Because such questions were in general decided upon party motives and as party questions. That was the ground upon which the Grenville Act was passed, and here they were laying down precedents which might be very mischievous, giving the House of Commons the power of saying that, as the Committee had not found that which was necessary to support the issuing of the Commission, they would put a construction upon the Report of the Committee which would bring it within the meaning of the Act of Parliament. He warned their Lordships against the consequence of that proceeding. His experience of Courts of Justice led him to this conclusion. . . . The noble Earl had said that their Lordships ought not to look to the evidence taken before the Committee to supply its defect. Undoubtedly their Lordships had nothing to do with the evidence for this purpose. Nothing could be more clear than that; though the evidence should show corruption to the greatest extent, they could not supply the defect in the Report. It was the Committee that ought to have drawn the conclusion. They ought to have reported in the words of the Act of Parliament; but, as they had not done so, their Lordships could not, by construction, supply the deficiency."—[3 Hansard, cxxv. 906.]

That related to the Canterbury case, which occurred in the first year after the Act of 1852 was passed. In the Clitheroe case, where the House of Commons addressed the Crown for a Commission, the House of Lords declined to join in the petition, and Lord Lyndhurst said—

“Their Lordships had no right whatever to refer to the Report of a Committee, or to its evidence, for the purpose of extending or varying the terms of that Report. He begged to assure their Lordships that that was no mere technical point, but that it, in effect, embodied a principle—the very principle upon which the Act of last Session was founded.”—[3 Hansard, cxxv. 1110.]

In the same case Lord Redesdale said—and the remark came with great weight from a person of his great Parliamentary experience—

“The true and only mode by which to secure a borough against an unjust, and oppressive, and tyrannical decision of a majority in Parliament was to say that they would insist upon the Report of the Committee containing the precise words used in the Act of Parliament. . . . Parliament has of late years passed several stringent enactments in order to prevent Party decisions of matters of this description by Election Committees, and to secure impartial judgments. If the Committee appointed to inquire reported that bribery had ‘extensively prevailed,’ it would be known that they intended to subject the borough to an inquiry; but if the Report did not contain these words, the borough should be saved from such an inquiry being issued against it by the tyranny of the Party which commanded a majority in the other House of Parliament. By insisting upon this, not only would their Lordships’ House give protection to those who required it, against the possible oppression of a majority of the other House, but they would save themselves from having perhaps very awkward and difficult questions sent up to them in times of great excitement and high political feeling.”—[Ibid. 915.]

These were considerations which every Party would do well not to forget. There was another case—that of the Dublin freemen—in which the proceeding was rather exceptional. The House of Commons sent up an Address for a Commission because the Judge reported extensive corruption among the freemen, though not in the whole constituency. In the course of the debate the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War (Mr. G. Hardy) said—

“It was most imperative that the House should confine itself to the Report of the Judge.”—[3 Hansard, cxcv. 1278.]

And the present Lord Chancellor said on the same occasion—

“What the statute has done is to interpose the Judge as the person who is to decide what is meant by the word ‘extensively.’ It is not that Parliament is to read the evidence, and form its own conclusion whether the bribery has been extensive or not; if that were so we might have those very painful discussions renewed in both Houses which politicians on all sides have long since endeavoured to sweep away from the action of Parliament—we might have Members coming down arguing on the Report as to whether or not the corrupt practices alleged had been ‘extensive.’ You have had the Judge interposed to avoid the whole of that scandal.”—[3 Hansard, cxvii. 1396.]

If this were a case of possible, or probable disfranchisement, he would not maintain—he had never maintained—that the House of Commons could not permit independent measures of its own. They might bring in a Bill, as they had done before, founded on the peculiar circumstances of the case, and proceed to regular action in this matter. But the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry had never attempted anything of the kind; he had never pretended this was a case of corruption which would warrant such a proceeding as that. Twelve men in a constituency of 6,000 were found to have received bribes, a large proportion of them being persons who had had their railway fare paid and there being a few shillings in excess of the fare. Nobody palliated such conduct, or denied that the men ought to be punished and the Member unseated for these acts; but there was no pretence that the disfranchisement of a constituency of 6,000 voters should follow from such a finding on the part of the Judge. The principle for which he had contended was that the rights of the constituency were a high franchise, and that they could not be taken away by Resolution of the House of Commons. The old rights of franchise stood on prescription; those of new boroughs like Stroud stood on Act of Parliament, and rights which were not conferred by Resolution of the House of Commons could not, in his opinion, be taken away or indefinitely suspended by such a Resolution. His hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) had a low opinion of precedents; but this was a point on which the House had already shown its opinion. The Prime Minister said the other day that these precedents were principles embalmed. It was quite plain that if this thing were done it would be done contrary to all precedents. The House of Commons had never done such a thing before. There was a special provision to ask the consent of the whole Legislature in dealing with a case of this kind. If that policy was wrong it could be reversed in a proper and constitutional manner either by repealing the reference of these questions to Judges or by special legislative action, if special legislative action were called for. The hon. and learned Member for Londonderry, however, did not consider the present case as one which would justify him in moving for a Committee of Inquiry, or in proposing a Bill to disfranchise the constituency of Stroud. All the hon. and learned Member asked was that the evidence should be before the House—a step that would be utterly useless, because when the House got the evidence it could do nothing in the matter. For these reasons, he should vote against the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry.

MR. SPENCER WALPOLE said, it had been stated that the House had parted with the power of deciding whether a writ should issue or not; but, in his judgment, the House had parted with no power unless it could be shown that the power vested in this House since it was first summoned to sit, and always without exception exercised by it, had been taken away from it by some specific Act of Parliament. From this point of view, therefore, the question would turn mainly upon the terms of the Act of Parliament commonly called the Parliamentary Elections Act. The hon. and learned Member (Sir William Harcourt) had said more than once that those who supported this Amendment were going to sit in judgment upon the decision of the Judge; that the decision of the Judge upon the point before the House was conclusive; and that Parliament had given to the Judge the power of determining conclusively all questions arising out of the disputed election. He, on the contrary, should be able to show that Parliament had distinctly reserved to the House of Commons the power of further considering some of those questions. This was how the case stood. The Act, by the 11th section, and the 13th sub-section, had made the decision of the Judge final and conclusive in two points, and in two only. It had made the decision of the Judge final and conclusive as to the return and as to the voidance of the election. But if the next sub-section of the clause were referred to, it would be seen that the Judge was to report upon matters which had been brought to his notice—such as where there was corruption; whether it had been practised with the knowledge of the sitting Member; the names of the persons bribed; and whether corrupt practices had extensively prevailed. But in not one of these respects was the decision of the Judge to be conclusive, nor ought it to be conclusive, for if it were so, then—when they had the evidence before them that people were kept out of the way, and that trick upon trick had been played to prevent the Judge from going into an inquiry which he had no means of prosecuting, and that his decision was made under circumstances which could not be conclusive. The House of Commons would be forced to say—“Whatever may have been the amount of corruption practised, we have no longer the power to consider and determine whether some further proceedings are not absolutely necessary to ensure the freedom and purity of elections.” That was not all. The hon. and learned Member for Staffordshire (Mr. Staveley Hill) had said that the clause in the Act of Parliament distinctly laid down what powers the House of Commons was still to possess and what had been taken away by inference. That clause, however, did not bear the construction which the hon. and learned Member had put upon it, and had he looked at the next clause he would have seen what powers had been reserved to the House. The clause to which the hon. and learned Member had referred was this—

“Where the House of Commons, on being informed by the Speaker of such certificate and Report, or Reports and judgment, shall order the same to be entered in the Journals, and shall give the necessary directions for confirming or altering the returns, or for issuing a writ for a new election, or for carrying the determination into execution, as circumstances may require.”

The final determination, therefore, of the whole question was reserved to that House for confirming or altering the Return, or for issuing or not issuing the writ, as circumstances might require. All doubt upon the subject, however, was removed by the next clause, which pointed out where the House had made a special Report. The House should make such order in respect of such special Report as they should think proper. The House was to pay the utmost respect to the Judge's certificate—indeed, they were bound by it; but with regard to the Report they were invited to consider the state of facts submitted to them, and what proceedings they would take with regard to them. If, after that, they were to be told that they were to be bound by the decision of the Judge and were to be controlled by precedent—although he agreed that precedents were the embodiment of principle—yet he should answer that he was willing to follow precedents where they were exactly analagous to the case under consideration and provided they met with reasonable assent. But was that the case here? Was there any precedent which showed them that a borough had had its returns challenged four times in the space of a year and a quarter—that in each instance corruption had been reported—and that in one instance it had extensively prevailed? He had said on rising that this question was one of great importance as regarded the Privileges of the House—and that it was a useful privilege for the House to retain, and if necessary to exercise. He was as strong as the hon. and learned Member (Sir William Harcourt) for not allowing either that or the other House to exercise exclusive authority upon matters that should be determined by the whole Parliament. The House of Commons could not determine any questions which were not legitimately within its province; but when the power of determining questions which were legitimately within its province had not been taken from it by any statute, it had a right to exercise that power; and such a power was that of determining whether the writ should issue or not. Could hon. Members judge of the expediency of issuing the writ in the present instance until they had seen the evidence taken in the case? They were not asked to see the evidence for the purpose of challenging the Judge's decision, but for the purpose of considering whether any further action should be taken in the matter. If that evidence showed that extensive corruption had not prevailed in the borough, by all means let the writ go; but if the evidence was to the contrary effect, it was their duty to determine whether some further steps had not become necessary.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU congratulated the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) that he had at last found out and had proclaimed to the House the little value which he attached to anonymous writing. A letter had appeared in The Times the other day signed "A Sheep without a

Mr. Spencer Walpole

Shepherd," in which it was urged that the Liberal Party should not be allowed to select their own Leader, and suggested that their Leader should be chosen by Earl Granville and a few other select persons, and it was followed the next day by another, signed "V.", in which it was stated that the Liberal Party was not to be trusted. The hon. and learned Gentleman had now extended his distrust to the House of Commons, which, in his opinion, was not fit to be trusted with the power of issuing writs, but ought to be bound, hand and foot, by the decision of the Judge. Of course, hon. Members were aware that every lawyer that entered the House came there with the object of getting either on to the Woolsack or the Bench, and it was very natural, therefore, that they should think it right that the House should be subservient to the Bench; but he (Lord Robert Montagu) hoped the House would not surrender their discretionary powers. The House had the power of suspending the writ, for otherwise the question would not have been put. Disfranchisement, however, could not take place without the consent of the three Estates. The Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry (Mr. Lewis) was, that the writ shall not now be issued. The House could not suspend a writ beyond the dissolution of the House. Immediately after that Her Majesty could order a new writ to be issued. All that the House was asked to sanction was that the issue of the writ should be delayed until the lapse of three days after the evidence taken by the Judge on the inquiry was laid before them, so that they might be able to form their own opinion whether corruption had extensively prevailed in the borough. To talk of the House of Commons disfranchising the borough in question was mere nonsense and obfuscation of intellect. The right hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) thought he had made out his point when he referred to the case of Stafford; but in that case the writ was delayed, and no more was asked for on the present occasion. The House was only asked not to act blindly in the matter, nor to adopt rashly the opinions of certain lawyers, who would make them cast away their privileges.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL, remarking that there were a question of law and a question of expediency mixed up in the case, proposed to say at the outset a word or two on the former, as it seemed to him there had been a slight misunderstanding. He did not think that the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) had contended, or had intended to contend, that the House of Commons had given up the privilege of appointing a Committee to investigate this matter. Certainly, he (the Solicitor General), for his part, had never contended, or intended to contend, anything of the sort. What he had said, and what he had adhered to, was, that it would be somewhat unconstitutional on the part of this House to suspend the writ simply for the purpose of inflicting a punishment on the constituency, and without having some ulterior object in view. That was all he had intended to say; and, speaking with deference, he did not believe the hon. and learned Member for Oxford had intended to say any more. Now, with regard to the power of the House of Commons, it was to his mind pretty clear that the House might, if it thought fit, appoint a Committee to investigate an alleged prevalence of corrupt practices in connection with an election at Stroud, or at any other place. The Act of 1852, under which a Commission might be issued for the purpose of ascertaining whether sufficient reasons existed for the disfranchisement of a constituency, was very plain and specific in its terms. By the first section it was provided that a Commission might be issued upon an Address of both Houses of Parliament, this Address to be founded upon a Report of a Committee appointed to try an Election Petition or to ascertain whether corrupt practices had extensively prevailed or not. Now, the Act of 1868 only placed the Election Judge in the position of the Committee, or, so to speak, in the shoes of the Committee of the House of Commons which formerly tried Election Petitions, and it gave to his Report the same effect as had formerly been given to the Report of that Committee. There was nothing in that Act, or in any subsequent Act, so far as he knew, to deprive the House of Commons of the power, if they thought fit to exercise it, of appointing a Committee of its own to ascertain whether or not corruption had extensively prevailed. So much for the law. He believed he had stated it pretty much as the hon. and learned Member for Oxford had done, and that he had stated it correctly. The question of expediency was quite another matter. On seeing the Notice of the present Amendment on the Paper, he thought it might possibly be of a different character from the Motion brought forward by the same hon. and learned Member the other evening; but when he had examined it attentively, he found it was in truth just their old friend in a new dress, and, for his part, he did not think the new garb was at all an improvement. What was the ulterior object of the hon. and learned Member? Was it that a Committee should be appointed, or that a Bill to disfranchise should be introduced? If he had either of these courses in view, why did he not state it? It was for the House to consider whether any advantage would be gained by suspending the writ till the evidence given before the learned Judge who tried the Election Petition at Stroud had been laid before them. In connection with this question, it was worthy of remark that the hon. and learned Member who had moved the Amendment had not made any application or Motion that the evidence should be printed, nor had anybody else. There would, therefore, be this curious result—that the writ would be suspended till evidence was printed which no one asked to have printed. But supposing it were printed, and the House of Commons had an opportunity of examining it, they could only discuss the evidence which had been offered to the learned Judge, which he had heard from the mouths of witnesses themselves, and when he had the opportunity of judging of their demeanour. The House, therefore, would only be able to consider at second hand what the Judge considered at first. Well, was there a case for the appointment of a Committee of this House to investigate the alleged prevalence of corrupt practices at Stroud? It appeared there had been four petitions and three Reports. The first two Reports, although there had been some reason why the Judges could not form a full and definite opinion, certainly contained no statement that corrupt practices had been extensively prevalent. Then, coming to the last Report, which seemed to him to be the one from which the House ought to judge of the conduct of Stroud, it was found that the learned

Judge—a very eminent Judge, who had gone into the whole case with remarkable patience—came to the conclusion that corrupt practices had not extensively prevailed. If this House, on an investigation of the matter, came to a conclusion opposed to that of the learned Judge, there certainly would be a state of things presented of a very extraordinary character, and such as had never been contemplated in the legislation bearing on this subject. It might be that Stroud had now repented and become virtuous, and if so there was no reason for suspending the writ, and depriving it of one of its representatives in Parliament. He should vote against the Amendment, for he regarded it as the same in effect as the Motion of the other evening, and did not find it was the intention of the hon. and learned Member to take any ulterior proceedings.

MR. STANTON, as one of the Members for Stroud, wished to say a few words on this question. He deeply regretted that it had lost so able and valuable a representative as Mr. H. Brand. He admitted that the Reports of the Judges had shown that many things had been done in that borough which had better been left undone; but still the House must remember that in two cases out of three the Judge had reported that corrupt practices had not extensively prevailed. The last trial was not stopped, as had been stated, by the Member surrendering his seat. It was heard out to an unprecedented length, so much so that the Judge described a great deal of the evidence as merely fishing for information. He believed that hon. Members would rather take the opinion of the Judge than care to investigate the evidence themselves. The fact of his standing in that House after having had his return called in question unsuccessfully a second time proved that his was a pure election. No doubt, Stroud had to a certain extent become demoralized, from having been kept so long in such a state of political excitement, and he thought few boroughs where sharply contested elections had been fought would have fared better under similar circumstances. He, therefore, could not allow that it was a corrupt borough. The proceedings which had been instituted had been vexatious and uncalled for, and the result had been principally to enable the prime mover in them to acquire the proud distinction—if such it was—of having caused greater injury to the town, more annoyance and ill-feeling amongst neighbours, and a greater waste of money than any other person in the neighbourhood. He hoped the House would not allow any further delay to take place in the issue of the writ, which would only add fuel to the already inflammable and excited state of feeling in the borough; and he trusted that it would be long before the borough was again brought so conspicuously before the notice of the House.

MR. RUSSELL GURNEY so fully agreed in what had been said by the right hon. Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Spencer Walpole), that he would offer but a very few words on that matter. But there were one or two points which he wished to urge on the attention of the House. The hon. and learned Solicitor General asked whether the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry (Mr. Lewis) had announced that he intended to propose any ulterior measure in regard to the borough of Stroud. Permit him to say that brought this case exactly within the precedent more than once quoted in that debate—namely, that of Wakefield. That was exactly the question put at that time to the late Sir George Lewis, who was asked—“Do you propose to do anything with reference to the borough of Wakefield?” and he distinctly said he did not; but that he would propose a general Bill, which would have no retrospective operation, and which would not apply to Wakefield and Gloucester; that no doubt it would be in the power of any hon. Member to propose a clause on that subject, but that he did not intend to propose such a clause. Not a single other Member ventured to say he meant to do so. Therefore, that case did form a precedent for the proposal of the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry; for the issue of the writ was put off from the end of one Session till the beginning of the next. Thus they had a precedent for the right, and there could be little doubt as to the expediency, in some instances, of having some delay in the issue of the writ. The hon. Member who spoke last called upon them to abide by the decision of the Judge, and no one could be more willing than he was to do so as to the points which the Judge had to decide. The hon. Gentleman said they were not justified in saying that further evidence which might have been given was withheld in consequence of the withdrawal of the claim to the seat; but the Judge himself distinctly reported that that was so, and if they were to abide by the decision of the Judge, they must abide by it on that as on other points. The high ground which had been taken the other night had been abandoned. There was no longer any doubt that the House had the right, in certain cases, to withhold the issue of the writ. But it was said they were confined to the single ground that further measures were contemplated. No doubt that would be the ordinary ground on which they would delay the issue of the writ; but they were not tied down to that single ground. There might be other grounds on which it would be undesirable to issue the writ; and, if they thought it was undesirable to issue it, they had an absolute power to delay issuing it. Much had been said as to the fear that if they refused to issue the writ, they would be throwing discredit on the tribunal which they had themselves created. He should be the last person who would wish to do that. With the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread), who spoke the other night on that subject, he took an active part in the Committee from which came the recommendation on which the Bill was subsequently founded. That Committee recommended that the trial of Election Petitions should be removed from the House of Commons and conducted by one of the Judges. He fully acquiesced in that proposal, and was anxious for it to be carried, and he believed it had worked thoroughly well. Having watched very carefully the different cases that had been tried before the Judges, he was perfectly satisfied with the working of that Act. He certainly, therefore, should not take any part in throwing discredit on that tribunal. But were they really asked to throw any discredit on it? There were certain things for the Judge to decide, and on which his decision was absolute, and there was nothing in the Judge's decision in that case that he contradicted. The Judge was bound to report as he did about the prevalence of bribery, as according to the way in which he reported on that would depend the issue of a Commission upon an Address to the Crown from both Houses. He admitted that by the Judge's decision on that point, they were precluded from having a Commission; and nobody proposed that there should be one. But then, were there not grounds for waiting until they had an opportunity of seeing the evidence? The Judge reported that in October, Joseph Workman, with his wife, was induced to emigrate by two persons on the list of bribers who were interested in sending him away; and it appeared that some of those things had been done with the knowledge of one, at least, of the respondent's agents. Those were matters which the Judge had thought fit to report for the information of the House. Again, the previous history of the borough ought to be taken into consideration. The Judge was not authorized to inquire into previous elections, but their history was known to the House; and they knew, as a fact, that there had been no fewer than four Petitions in the course of seven months, and that in all those cases there had been more or less bribery. Then, taking all these circumstances into account, he was most anxious that it should not be held hereafter that they were precluded, either by former precedent or by statute, from entering into a consideration of these matters; and, being at liberty, as they were, to take them into consideration, it was not an unreasonable request to ask that they should delay issuing the writ until they had had an opportunity, at any rate, of looking at the evidence in the case, as well as at the proceedings adopted in other cases, in order to see what ought to be done. On those grounds he should support the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry.

POSTPONEMENT OF NOTICE.

MR. NEWDEGATE took occasion to postpone the Notice which stood on the Paper in his name with reference to Public Bills, observing that it would not be convenient to bring it on in a thin House.

FRIENDLY SOCIETIES BILL.

OBSERVATIONS.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reference to an Answer given by the Chancellor of the Exchequer earlier in the evening, appealed to the right hon. Gentleman not to persevere in taking the second reading of the Friendly Societies Bill on Monday. From all that he had heard he felt quite certain that it would be extremely inconvenient if the right hon. Gentleman persisted in that determination. The Bill was one of very considerable complexity, as it dealt with a very difficult subject, and the complexity was still further increased by there being three different matters to deal with—the Report of the Royal Commission, the Bill of last year, and the Bill of this year. He was informed by hon. Members that it was quite impossible that the matter could be satisfactorily discussed—for the Bill was a subject which must be discussed on the second reading, and the debate must be important—on Monday evening. He would therefore ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he would not think it much more for the convenience of Members to postpone the second reading until some future day?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER observed, that the previous Question which had been put to him placed the matter upon this footing—that if the second reading were taken on Monday there would not be sufficient time to allow of the provisions of the Bill being read and considered in the country. Now, the persons who were particularly interested in the question had been considering the matter all the Recess, and they had had frequent communications upon the subject with the Government. He therefore thought that it was not at all necessary on their account that there should be further delay. But the noble Marquess had put the matter on a different ground when he spoke of the inconvenience to Members of the House. He need not say that he and his Colleagues were anxious, in every possible way, to consult the convenience of the Members of the House; and therefore, feeling that this subject was one which ought not to be dealt with or passed over in a hurry, the second reading would be postponed. He hoped, however, that no long delay would be desired, and that if a day somewhat later than Monday were fixed hon. Members would then be prepared to discuss the matter. The second reading would, therefore, not be taken on Monday; but on that day he would state when they would propose that it should be brought on.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

SUPERANNUATION ACT, 1859 [SPECIAL RATES OF PENSION].

(In the Committee.)

Resolved, That it is expedient to grant special rates of Pension to persons who have served in an established capacity in the permanent Civil Service of the State, where such persons have served in an unhealthy place.

Resolution to be reported upon Monday next.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD STRATHEDEN inquired of Her Majesty's Government, Whether it is intended to lay upon the Table any Correspondence with regard to the alleged demand of Austria, Russia, and the German Empire to form commercial treaties with Servia and Roumania independently of the Ottoman Government? He did not mean to trouble their Lordships with any extended statement on the subject—he would only mention what appeared to him to be a conclusive reason for the production of the Correspondence. We had heard a great deal lately of the controversy which had arisen with regard to the right of Servia and Roumania to negotiate commercial treaties independently of the Empire of which they formed a part; but in the absence of authentic documents it was still uncertain to us whether such a controversy really did exist, and if it did whether the demand for the commercial treaties in question had come from Servia and Roumania on the one hand, or from Austria, Russia, and the German Empire on the other. Should the demand have originated with Servia and Roumania it suggested a certain order of political considerations; should it have originated with the three Great Powers he had mentioned, it would suggest another and perfectly distinct order of political considerations. But whether the controversy existed or not, and on whichever side the demand had arisen, it had revived what was called the "Eastern Question," and created the impression, whether justly or otherwise, that the Treaty of 1856 was seriously menaced.

THE EARL OF DERBY: In answer to the appeal of my noble Friend, I am afraid I must say that I am not prepared at the present moment to lay on the Table any Papers relating to the subject to which his Question refers. I shall be ready to do so at a later period; but negotiations upon the subject are still going on, and while they remain incomplete I think that the publication of the Correspondence would probably do more to obstruct than facilitate a satisfactory settlement such as we all wish for. I cannot appreciate the bearings of what has been said by my noble Friend as to whether the dispute now existing was originally raised by the Government of the Principalities or the Governments of the three Great Powers. I apprehend that with whichever party the claim originated, if it is supported by both parties, it makes very little difference by whom the idea was first started. I may further say, that I do not look on the question as one from which there is any reason to apprehend any disturbance of the peace in Europe or in the East. All the Great Powers are agreed that it is desirable that the Government of the Principalities should have power to negotiate and enter into commercial treaties; but the difference which has arisen is this—some of the leading Governments of Europe consider that the Principalities have that right under existing Treaty arrangements; while those Governments which take a different view, though they are quite willing that the right should be conceded, contend that it does not at present exist, and that it can only emanate from a concession of the Government of the Porte. That is the issue to which the question is now narrowed. It is not so much a question of what is desirable, or what shall be done, as of the manner in which it shall be done. I may add that those Powers who take a different view from that which we take, and who contend that the Government of the Principalities have the right which they claim, nevertheless have expressed in the strongest language their determination to adhere to the treaty engagements into which they have entered—the difference between them and us being merely this—that they construe those engagements in a different sense.

A BLIND BOY AT DROGHEDA.

QUESTION.

MR. W. JOHNSTON asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If his attention has been called to a statement that a blind boy, named John M'Cracken, was, for reading in the street from a Bible with embossed letters, sent to prison for forty-eight hours by the Mayor of Drogheda; and, whether such statement is true; and, if so, what cognizance of the matter will be taken by the Government?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in reply, said, his attention had been first called to that matter by the Notice of the hon. Member's Question. The blind boy in question was reading the Bible, sitting on the footway in one of the public streets of Drogheda. By so doing he caused a crowd to collect round him, and on being requested by the police to move on, he and his father declined to do so. After repeated cautions he was arrested by the police, not for reading the Bible, but for obstructing the public thoroughfare. He was taken before the Mayor and committed for 48 hours. That, he believed, was a statement of the facts as they occurred. As far as he knew at present, the Mayor of Drogheda was acting within his legal rights as a magistrate, and therefore the Government had no intention of interfering in the matter.

PARLIAMENT—BOROUGH OF BOSTON—
ISSUE OF A ROYAL COMMISSION.

QUESTION.

MR. YORKE asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether his attention has been called to the Report of Mr. Justice Grove, presented to this House on the 8th of June 1874, with reference to the late Election Petition for the Borough of Boston, in which he states that, in pursuance of the Act, he reports as follows:—

“That there is reason to believe that corrupt practices have extensively prevailed at the Election for the Borough of Boston, to which the said Petition relates;”

and, if so, whether it is his intention, in accordance with precedent, to move the House to pray the Crown to issue a Royal Commission to inquire into such corrupt practices?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: In answer, Sir, to the Question of my hon. Friend the Member for East Gloucestershire, I have to state that my attention has been directed not only to the Report of Mr. Justice Grove with reference to the late Election Petition for the borough of Boston, but also to the judgment pronounced by him in the matter, and to the evidence upon which both the judgment and the Report were based, and, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, it appears to me that it will only be consistent with my duty to act upon the Report of the learned Judge, and to move the House, as suggested by my hon. Friend in his Question, to pray the Crown to issue a Royal Commission to inquire into the corrupt practices referred to in the Report. I may add that, although the first Report of the learned Judge was made as long ago as June last, his final Report affecting the seat of one of the sitting Members was only laid before the House on the first day of the present Session, so that it was only the other day my attention was particularly directed to the matter.

QUESTION.

COLONEL JERVIS asked the Secretary of State for War, What amount has been expended on the new works at Landguard Fort up to 1st January 1875; what further amount is proposed to be expended in completing them; and what is the nature of its proposed armament; whether it is true that the supply of water to that fortress has been cut off since October last by order of the lord of the adjacent manor; and, whether such supply of water had not flown uninterruptedly since A.D. 1625; and, if so, what steps have been taken to maintain the dignity of the Crown and the rights of the people?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Sir, £28,516 has been spent up to the 1st of January last on these works, and £9,800 more will be required to complete them. The proposed armament is five 38-ton guns, three 18-ton guns, and four 12-ton guns. It is true that the supply of water has been cut off since the middle of September; but an information at the suit of the Attorney General has been filed in Chancery against the lord of the manor to cause him to restore the supply and pay all the damage.

PARLIAMENT—SITTINGS OF THE HOUSE.—QUESTION.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, in view of the late hours to which the sittings of this House are frequently extended, Her Majesty's Government has considered the advisability of recommending to the House the adoption of a rule fixing an hour beyond which no sitting should be continued?

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I am myself opposed, as a general rule, to restricting the action of the House, and although it may be necessary, under certain conditions, to accede to an arrangement of that kind, I do not think that the proposition suggested by the hon. Gentleman should be adopted. Very late hours are sometimes necessary. I trust they will not be often necessary; but, on the whole, I think it is better to trust to the good sense and good temper of the House than to impose any restriction of the nature implied in the Question.

IRELAND—CROWN SOLICITOR FOR TYRONE.—QUESTION.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If Mr. Cecil Moore is still in the employment of the Crown as Sessional Crown Solicitor for the county Tyrone; and, what steps the Master of the Rolls in Ireland had taken in relation to the solicitors engaged in the case of John M'Crea before the Lords Commissioners of the Great Seal for Ireland?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in reply, said, that Mr. Cecil Moore still held the appointment referred to by the hon. Member. He had no official knowledge of any steps that had been taken by the Master of the Rolls in the case in question; but whatever action had been taken by the Master of the Rolls was within his own discretion, and he was not aware that the Executive Government had any right to interfere.

PATRIOTIC FUND—AUDIT OF ACCOUNTS.—QUESTION.

COLONEL MAKINS asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether the Treasury have exercised the power given to them by the 30 and 31 Victoria, cap. 98, section 17, of auditing the Accounts of the Patriotic Fund, and the last date the Accounts have been so audited under the directions of the Treasury; and, if a Copy of the audited Accounts would be laid upon the Table if moved for?

MR. W. H. SMITH, in reply, said, that the Treasury, in exercise of the power given to them by the Act referred to, had requested the Controller and Auditor General to undertake the audit of the accounts of the Patriotic Fund. It was, however, found that there were difficulties in the way of imposing that duty upon him, and it was finally arranged that the audit should be carried out by an independent auditor. Owing to the difficulties referred to, the audit of the accounts had been somewhat delayed; but the Treasury would have no objection to the production of the last audited account, or of the accounts as they would be audited in future.

THE ARCTIC EXPEDITION.—QUESTION.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether it is the intention of the Government to give the House any information as to the probable cost and possible perils of the proposed Expedition to the Arctic Regions, and also as to what scientific or geographical results they hope for; and, if so, when that information may be expected?

MR. A. EGERTON, in reply, said, that on Friday last he laid on the Table of the House the Report of the Admiralty Arctic Committee which was summoned to consider the equipment of the Arctic ships, and the conditions under which they were to be despatched. He intended, in the course of that evening, to lay on the Table a detailed estimate of the expenditure—as far as it was at present ascertained—connected with the sending forth of that expedition. It might interest the House to know—before it was printed—that the amount of that estimate was £98,000, which, of course, included the cost of the ships that had been purchased and the three years' stores with which they were to be provided. He might also say, with regard to the latter part of the Question, that those most conversant with the subject did not expect for the expedition any considerable perils. The First Lord, in moving the Vote, which he hoped to be able to do shortly before Easter, would give a more detailed statement as to the objects of the expedition.

AGRICULTURAL TENANCIES BILL. QUESTION.

MR. DODSON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he can inform the House when it is proposed to introduce the Agricultural Tenancies Bill?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, it must have escaped the notice of the right hon. Gentleman opposite that the Lord President of the Council had in "another place" some time ago given Notice that he would himself introduce that Bill as soon as the Public Business would permit.

POST OFFICE—TELEGRAPH OFFICE AT BALLINAMORE.—QUESTION.

DR. BRADY asked the Postmaster General, If he will explain to the House on what grounds he refuses to establish a postal telegraph office at the town of Ballinamore, county Leitrim, in accordance with a resolution of the Grand Jury of the county, and in compliance with Petitions sent from several Boards of Poor Law Unions, supported by the chairman and magistrates of the county, and the police authorities of the district?

LORD JOHN MANNERS, in reply, said, that an application for the establishment of the postal telegraph office referred to in the Question, had been refused, because it appeared on careful inquiry that the revenue which would accrue from such an office was not likely to defray the working expenses. If, however, any local arrangement could be made to pay those expenses, the Government would be happy to grant a liberal discount on all public messages from the office.

SPAIN—RECOGNITION OF THE EXISTING GOVERNMENT.—QUESTION.

MR. O'CLERY asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, in view of the fact that the Government of Marshal Serrano so recently recognised by Her Majesty no longer exists, and of the defeat publicly reported to have been given by the Royal Army of Don Carlos to the Alphonsist Troops in Navarre, Her Majesty's Ministers are prepared to recommend the speedy recognition of the Liberal Government of Madrid?

MR. BOURKE: In reply, Sir, to the hon. Member for Wexford, I have to state that Her Majesty's Government have determined to recommend Her Majesty to recognize the existing Government of Spain. They have done so for the same reason as induced them last year to recommend Her Majesty to recognize the Government of Marshal Serrano—namely, that the existing Government seems to be de facto established over all, except a very small portion, of that kingdom. Under those circumstances, new credentials will be sent to Her Majesty's Minister at Madrid this evening.

PALACE OF WESTMINSTER—THE MACLISE FRESCOES IN THE QUEEN'S GALLERY.—QUESTION.

MR. HANKEY asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether he has obtained during the Recess any opinion as to the possibility of restoring the two Maclise Frescoes in the Queen's Gallery of the House of Lords; and, if he has, whether he will lay a Copy of such opinion upon the Table of the House?

LORD HENRY LENNOX: In consequence of the representations made by the hon. Member last Session as to the state of Maclise's great water-glass pictures in the Royal Gallery, I, at the close of the Session, addressed myself to my noble Friend Lord Hardinge, and he was good enough to accede to my request and consent to preside over a small Committee, who should inspect those works of art, and say what should be done with them. Besides Lord Hardinge, I was fortunate enough to obtain the co-operation of Sir William Boxall, Mr. Ward, and Mr. Richmond. Mr. Watts had also agreed to give me his valuable help, but was prevented by illness from attending. The Committee met several times in the Royal Gallery, and made a minute examination of the pictures. After that they made a unanimous Report to me that they were strongly of opinion that by a simple process the decay might be arrested. They also added that if I would give the necessary permission, Mr. Richmond would, with great public spirit and at a great loss of valuable time, personally superintend the difficult and delicate process. Under such circumstances, I had no hesitation in assuming the responsibility; and I am very happy to say that the result has been attended with the very greatest success. With regard to Papers, I have only the Report of the Committee, signed by Lord Hardinge, enclosing a separate statement, from Mr. Richmond, detailing the process by which the good result has been obtained. Those Papers I shall be happy to lay on the Table of the House to-morrow.

MONASTIC AND CONVENTUAL INSTITUTIONS.—QUESTION.

In reply to Mr. NEWDEGATE,

MR. BOURKE said, that the documents and translations with respect to the laws of foreign States relating to monastic institutions which had been ordered on the 27th of last July were in the hands of the printers, and would be laid on the Table of the House in the course of a few days.

COPYRIGHT BILL.—QUESTION.

In reply to Mr. E. JENKINS,

MR. BOURKE said, that he had put down the Bill for Wednesday next, not thinking that there would be much discussion upon it; but he should be happy to put it down for any other day that might be deemed convenient.

PRIVILEGE — OFFENSIVE LANGUAGE REFERRING TO IRISH MEMBERS. RESOLUTIONS.

MR. SULLIVAN rose, pursuant to Notice, to bring before the House a question of Privilege. In doing so, he said, he viewed with the gravest apprehensions the raising of such a question on the part of any hon. Member, lest such a course should tend to limit, not only freedom of discussion, but that freedom of independent criticism upon the conduct of public men, whether inside the House in which they were assembled, or outside it, which was so essential to healthy public opinion in the country. He might cite precedents to show the Privileges of the House had been asserted in a way which would now be considered most arbitrary, not against Members of that assembly, but against members of "the Fourth Estate"—the Public Press, to which the House of Commons, and, indeed, the cause of liberty throughout the world owed more than to any Legislative Chamber. He hoped hon. Members would, therefore, not think that he had risen on that occasion to take exception in any narrow spirit or on small provocation to a wound on the dignity of the House. For his own part—and he might, he believed, say as much for several of his hon. Friends around him—he felt that it might be and would be often his duty to assert very strongly that very liberty of speech which as a consequence he ought to be the very last to complain of. Nor would it become him to lay hold of an accidental utterance which had escaped in the warmth of the moment, and which the speaker was afforded no opportunity to qualify or withdraw. They were all of them amenable to influences whether before or after dinner which might cause them to say something which in their calmer moments they would regret, and it was no reflection on an honourable man to rise when the opportunity was afforded him and frankly to state that he was sorry to have given offence. Then there would be an end of the matter. In the present instance he would undertake to show the House that he had not risen on any trivial pretext or because of any hasty words for the qualification of which no fair opportunity had been offered. He would not weary hon. Members by going over a long list of precedents for such a Motion as that which he was about to make. He would as briefly as possible refer to a few which might be found within the life-time of many of those whom he addressed. In 1824 Mr. Abercromby raised a question of Privilege in that House, and had complained of no less a personage than the Lord Chancellor of England. The Lord Chancellor had said in his Court that something which had been stated in the House was false; and thereupon the question of Privilege was raised, and the Commons of the Three Kingdoms independently vindicated those Privileges to which they could never be insensible without a forfeiture of their duty to the country. It was, however, explained on the part of Lord Eldon that he had used the phrase complained of as applicable to the comments in the newspapers rather than to statements made in the House of Commons; and accordingly when the question was further pressed the Motion was lost, the Ayes being 102, the Noes 151. The next remarkable case was in 1838, and concerned a countryman of his own—one whose name in that House would, he thought, be received with respect, as in Ireland it was hailed as that of the great national Liberator—he referred to the late Mr. O'Connell. Mr. O'Connell, at a public dinner, used language which even he (Mr. Sullivan) would not hesitate to say ought not to have been used, and which was a breach of the Privileges of that House. In condemning the use of that language he felt that the character and fame of O'Connell were too great to suffer because exception was taken to some of his individual actions. Mr. O'Connell stated in the instance of which he was speaking that there was on the part of the Tory politicians the grossest perjury, and that there had been foul perjury in the Tory Committees of the House of Commons. No one rose in the House on that occasion to shelter O'Connell by inquiring whether there were any "Tory politicians" in the House, as had been recently done when some charge of venality was recently heard against Ultramontane Members; but both sides of the House rose to a broader conception of the dignity of that assembly and did not seek to ignore the fact that then as to-day there were hon. Members present who were proud of being known as "Tory politicians," and who, to their credit, felt that it was due to their position both inside and outside the House, that the words of Mr. O'Connell should not pass unchallenged. After debate, the Motion censuring Mr. O'Connell was carried by 226 to 197. The next case was that of Mr. Ferrand, in 1844, who had said that Sir James Graham had caused a subordinate officer of the Government to make a false Report, and had then used that false Report to crush a Member of the House. There were in that case many arguments relied upon to take it out of the purview of that Assembly. It was contended that the charge made against Sir James Graham of having procured a subordinate to falsify a Report related to his action, not as a Member of the House, but as an official and a public officer, and could not, therefore, be taken by the House into account; while it was argued that the phrase "to crush a Member of the House," whatever that might mean, did apply to Sir James Graham as one of their body; the main debate turned upon that portion of the charge, and after various Motions and proceedings a Motion was carried to the effect that "the imputations were unfounded and calumnious." If it was necessary in 1844 to have been thus studiously careful of imputations reflecting on the personal character and conduct of public men, it was far more so in 1875, in consequence of the great changes which had been made not only in the constitution of the House of Commons, but also in the laws under which its Members were elected. Many hon. Members were old enough to remember the solemn, sorrowful, prophetic warnings which were raised by venerable gentlemen of, he might say, a bygone generation, when the House of Commons broke down the bulwarks of aristocratic representation, and abolished the property qualification of its Members. Worse still, vote by ballot was adopted; and then many old gentlemen shook the dust of the House off their feet, and went out declaring that there was an end to the Constitution; that we were beginning to "Americanize" our institutions; the result would be deplorable; and that in the House of Commons the business of the country would be conducted in language which would not be tolerated in polite society. Working men's candidates had, in fact, been returned, and it would be well for the House soon to ascertain how far the prophecies as to the use of rough and unbecoming language were about to be realized, and whether the deterioration in the personnel of that Assembly was to be found among the working men's representatives or among those gentlemen who pretended to be the especial guardians of the dignity of the House. During the Recess hon. Members had, as usual, addressed their constituents, forming what was called "Parliament out of Session;" and we in Ireland noticed that at more than one of these gatherings the tone of speech adopted was one which seemed to be studiously insulting and provocative to the Irish Gentlemen who sat in that House. Irishmen were not always too slow to take offence; but if it had been but of one speech they had to complain, the thing might have ended there. Of political criticism they did not complain. It was not desirable, indeed, that hon. Gentlemen should be too strait-laced when they came to discuss a public policy which they probably in their hearts believed to be inimical to the stability of the Empire. They had a perfect right, within the ordinary limits of decorum, to denounce that policy. But the Irish Members regarded it as quite another thing, and a thing they would not submit to, to have their personal conduct and personal reputation sullied. The first of the utterances to which he had referred, was made in North Lincolnshire. And if the Intelligent Foreigner was about, he would have an excellent opportunity of studying the style of language adopted by an hon. Baronet (Sir John Astley), and, indeed, not severely condemned, but only laughed at by some of the country Gentlemen in the House. What the hon. Baronet was reported to have said was this—

"The House of Commons was not altogether a place to be coveted or desired, and he doubted whether any gentleman who was used to the country would care to be shut up there hour after hour, day and night. There were, besides, a lot of Irish chaps in the House who sometimes made him very angry. He thought there were about 60 of these fellows in the House, and he believed about 40 of them were the most confounded rascals he ever saw. He did not find fault with anybody because he might hold opinions different from his, but he entirely lost his patience when those 'coveys' came into the House."

"Coveys!" what did that mean? Whether he (Mr. Sullivan) was deficient in dictionary terms or not, he felt bound to confess that he should need a glossary of some kind if this kind of language was to be extensively adopted by hon. Gentlemen. The hon. Baronet proceeded—

"He entirely lost his patience when those coveys came into the House, and took up the whole of an afternoon, and carried on far into the night, when some pressing Motion was coming on, talking about their little rotten Ireland, whether the whisky was to be Irish or Scotch, or whether the potatoes should be kidnneys or something else."

Well, as to the whisky, the hon. Baronet had probably a good right to speak on the subject. He (Mr. Sullivan) had no intention of making personal reflections. All he would say was, that if the Irish Members did distress the English landed Gentlemen with their debates about whisky, it was because the whole of them, with the exception of ten, came into that House backed by the unanimous appeal of the clergy of all denominations in Ireland not to force the drinking of whisky on Sunday upon the Irish people—an appeal which was crushed by a large majority. The hon. Baronet went on to say—

"Such discussions were one of the things which drove him clean out of the House, and tended to make a man more careless than he should be. These 40 Irish rascals to whom he had referred took up more time than all the rest of the Members, and used much stronger language: but, fortunately, they were divided among themselves."

A complaint about strong language came well from the hon. Baronet, whose own language was such that he (Mr. Sullivan) begged to apologize to the "working men's representatives" for supposing it possible that it could have come from them. The working men's candidates had spoken both inside and outside the House since they were clothed with the high office and dignity of popular Representatives, and he asserted for them with confidence that, working men's Representatives as they were, they had proved themselves English Gentlemen, for whom neither the constituencies who elected them, nor the country which gave them birth, had need to blush. They had proved themselves, in a special manner, indeed, representatives of the intelligence, worth, and integrity of the working men of Britain. When the remarkable speech he had quoted reached Ireland, there was some strong feeling manifested, and it was at once determined that notice should be taken of it in the proper way. Some of the Irish Members were for taking a course a little more belligerent than the others desired, and said—"If we don't stop this Gentleman at once, you will have a crop of others following in his wake, with perhaps as much willingness to wound as he, but with a little more skill in framing their language than the hon. Baronet the Member for North Lincolnshire." What was foreseen took place. Pleased and encouraged by the immunity which the hon. Baronet had enjoyed, other speakers at subsequent banquets followed in his wake, and endeavoured to deepen and render more painful the wound which he had inflicted. At Oxford the junior Member for the City declared that the Irish Members were "pledged to dismember an Empire of which they were not fit to be the subjects." Another hon. Member—the hon. and learned Member for Frome (Mr. Lopes)—took an opportunity to insult the Irish Members with a dexterous and delicate manipulation which was only possible to a man trained in the subtleties of legal argument. The hon. and learned Member said—

The hon. and learned Member went on to say that in the face of all these facts the Liberal Party ought to remain quiet, and lick their wounds in silence. There were many hon. Gentlemen in the House who were strongly opposed to every political opinion he (Mr. Sullivan) held; but he would, nevertheless, appeal to those hon. Members to say whether Irish Members could, under repeated insults like these, refrain from appealing to one tribunal or another. He at once excepted the hon. Baronet the Member for North Lincolnshire from being called upon in any sense to account to the House for the speech which he made; because, although his speech was the most violent of those to which exception was taken, he had the moral courage and the candour to make an apology when called upon to do so. If the fact of the apology, and the circumstances under which it was made, had reached so obscure a place as Frome, the hon. and learned Member for that borough would probably have thought twice before he made the speech from which a passage had been quoted. The circumstances were these:—A military friend of the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. O'Clery), who felt himself aggrieved by the speech of the hon. Baronet, waited upon him with a polite inquiry as to the condition of his health, and particularly of his trigger finger. The solicitous anxiety of the Irish military gentleman was well understood by the hon. Baronet, who at once wrote a letter saying, in effect—"I know what you want; tell your friend the Member for Wexford that I withdraw unreservedly the language which, unhappily, I used." They did not all belong to the military fraternity, and it was not every Irish Member who was practised in the mode of interrogation adopted in the case of the hon. Baronet. They, therefore, offered to the hon. and learned Member for Frome (Mr. Lopes) a mode of retracting his insult which ought to have been more acceptable to him, as it was certainly more in accordance with the respect they desired to pay the House. He was sorry that on Friday last the hon. and learned Member did not frankly avail himself of the opportunity which was afforded to him—for there was no desire on the part of the Members insulted to bring the hon. Member to his knees, or to put him in any unhandsome difficulty. Instead of doing this, he made several excuses for the speech by saying, in the first place, that it was delivered "after dinner." This was the euphemistic way in which he described his state of mind. It was high time that his hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) pushed forward his Bill, if excuses of this kind were to pass current among Members of the foremost Assembly of Gentlemen in the world. Such an excuse would not avail William Nokes, a collier, if he were charged with an offence before a magistrate, and it ought not to avail a gentleman of high station who, among other titles, possessed that of one of Her Majesty's Counsel learned in the Law. The excuse was a paltry one, and altogether lacking in the candour, boldness, and manliness which should distinguish a Gentleman entitled to a seat in that House. In the second place, the hon. and learned Member said he meant no offence by the words he used. A member of the Illinois Legislature on one occasion pulled the nose of a brother legislator, and promptly explained that he meant no offence; but the explanation, like that of the hon.

and learned Member for Frome, was not, and could not, be accepted. In the third place, the hon. and learned Member said his sole intention was to reprehend a policy which could only lead to a dismemberment of the Empire. This might have been the meaning of the hon. and learned Member; but he could only congratulate him on the accuracy of his statement at the expense of his understanding, for the grammatical construction of his speech flatly contradicted it. His words did not refer to any line of political conduct, but to personal reputability. He said nothing about public policy; but he did say that the Liberal Party were allied to a disreputable Irish band. In the last place, the hon. and learned Gentleman referred the Gentlemen he had affronted to the pages of a Dictionary. It was not the custom in his country for a man, when affronted, to go home and consult a Dictionary. The times had mended, even with regard to the authority they used to consult in former days; and he had, therefore, adopted the suggestion of the hon. and learned Member, and referred to the Dictionary of Dr. Johnson—although he contended that the House could alone fix the standard of language to be used by its Members in relation to each other. He had consulted the 9th edition of Johnson's Dictionary, published in four volumes, and failed to find the word "disreputable" in it. There was the word "disrepute," and this was stated to mean "ill-character, dishonour, want of reputation." Then there was the word "disreputation," which was said to mean "disgrace, dishonour, loss of reputation, ignominy." [An hon. MEMBER interposed a remark.] The word "disreputable" might be Todd, but it certainly was not Johnson. Just a word as to the whole of the charge brought by the hon. and learned Member for Frome. He asked what was the condition of the Liberal Party?—and he could not be blamed for exulting in the contrast now presented between the Ministerial and the Opposition sides of the House. He (Mr. Sullivan) should be the last to cavil at any little exuberance of spirit arising out of the recent successes of the Conservative Party—successes which astonished nobody in the world more than themselves. They had long eaten the bitter bread of exile, and he had no desire to curb the rejoicings with which they hailed their entrance to the Promised Land of office. The hon. and learned Member (Mr. Lopes) described the Liberal Party as having been deserted by their Leader;—and here, again, it was legitimate for him to crow lustily. The hon. and learned Member and his Party had a Leader of whom they might well be proud—a Leader who never, even in the most gloomy days, despaired of the Tory Party. He did not desert his Party when it was in sorer straits than was the Liberal Party at the present time. He adhered to their fortunes while jealousies dogged his footsteps and murmurs of mutiny were heard that might well have driven him from their camp; and, in the end, as they had seen, he had led his Party to victory. The hon. and learned Member, like Demosthenes in his orations, having led up to it artistically, came to the most deadly charge of all—that the Liberal Party was allied to a band—to a disreputable band—to a disreputable Irish band—in the House of Commons. On that question of alliance it was right he (Mr. Sullivan) should say a few words. There had been no alliance negotiated, nor was there any alliance in existence between the Liberal Party and the Home Rule Party. It was undoubtedly true that the greater number of the members of the Home Rule Party on other questions than Home Rule were Liberals; but that Party also included members who were staunch Conservatives. It was true that in the main the sympathies of the great majority of them were with hon. Members on that side; but they felt equally independent in giving support to any useful measure that might emanate from the other side of the House. Was it to be hurled as a taunt or accusation against Home Rule Members, that they had rescued the Irish representation in that House from the condition under which its support was sought to be allured by the Galway subsidy offered by a Conservative Administration, or by a half-dozen places for good loyal Catholics on the part of the Liberals? They had ceased to render the Irish Party amenable to such political corruption; but they had never sought in any discourteous way to repudiate the fact that hon. Gentlemen around them who might be opposed to them on the Home Rule question were to be found in the same division lobby with themselves. Of all the charges made by the hon. and learned Member for Frome that of an alliance was the least grounded on fact. But let him (Mr. Sullivan) say, as he had touched on the duty of Irish Members in that House, that in bringing forward this matter they did not present themselves as suppliants for any special protection or satisfaction for themselves. As far as concerned their personal honour, they would take care of that themselves. They were not suing for any special protection that was not given on the ground of the dignity of that Assembly itself. They hoped to conduct themselves in the debates in that House in a manner consistent with its usages and with the spirit which pervaded it. If the language used by the hon. and learned Member for Frome affected only one Member of the House, it would have been a very grave offence. But that language was an insult to 50 Members of the House. It was something still more serious—it was a crime against that House. It was spoken by a Member of one nationality against Members who represented another, and was therefore calculated to inflame national feeling, and to excite national passion. The hon. and learned Member for Frome was probably now in his calmer mood he would ask him this—was it not unchivalrous to make such a charge on the part of the many who were strong against the few who were weak? The Home Rule Members were weak; those Members who objected to Home Rule were strong. The Home Rule Members left their country to come to the House and plead, under most disadvantageous circumstances that entitled them to generous consideration, the cause of that country. According to the laws of all civilized nations the persons of ambassadors were specially secured from assault or indignity. The Home Rule Members were the ambassadors of the Irish Nation, and it was exactly in that capacity that they had thus been insulted. In that capacity they were that night. Let him say, in concluding, that his Friends had warned him how all this would end in the House. He had been warned that the hon. and learned Member would escape with impunity—that after he (Mr. Sullivan) had sat down and a few speeches had been made, and perhaps some warmth—which he, for his part, deprecated—had been exhibited, there would arise to calm the ruffled scene the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli), whom they were always so glad to hear in that House; that he would sternly reprehend unparliamentary language in the abstract, but genially extenuate it in the particular; that he would say something kind about the Isle from which the Home Rule Party came, and would then recommend them to say no more about this matter. He (Mr. Sullivan) showed how little he agreed with those vaticinations by rising to make a statement. It was his duty to acknowledge that the right hon. Gentleman, throughout his career as a statesman had shown a warm interest in whatever concerned the honour and dignity of that House, which had been the cradle of his ambition and the theatre of his fame. For his (Mr. Sullivan's) part, his task was fulfilled in calling attention to this matter. Heartily did he regret that it had devolved upon him, in the absence of his distinguished Friend, whose greater acquaintance with the Forms and precedents of the House would have lent force to his argument and whose genius would have rendered it attractive. He was deeply conscious of the very indulgent and generous spirit in which the House had listened to him that evening, and which had more than compensated in his own estimation for the inability which he had felt in rising to make this statement. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving that the passage complained of be read by the Clerk at the Table.

Motion agreed to.

The said paper delivered in, and the paragraph complained of read.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that while listening to the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) it occurred to him that the hon. Member appeared perfectly satisfied with the position of the Irish Members in that House. The hon. Member for Louth was prompt to bring forward certain expressions that had fallen from Members of the House elsewhere, although in the case of the hon. Member for Lincolnshire (Sir John Astley) the words had been retracted. The hon. Member now asked for a retractation of the expressions used by the hon. Member for Frome (Mr. Lopes), and sought to have them placed on the records of the House, but he proposed no action. It seemed to him surprising that the hon. Member, who, as he told the House, represented the feeling of a whole nation, should show such a deficiency of courage; and he (Mr. Newdegate) would ask whether it was worth while to occupy so much of the time of the House when no action was to be taken? After all, the expressions complained of had reference to the discontent produced by Irish Members in connection with the Home Rule movement, which was, in reality, a disguised agitation for the repeal of the Union. For his own part, he had been led to doubt whether it would not be better for the Irish Members to retire in a body. He admitted that that would be a deep disadvantage to the United Kingdom; but if Irish Members were determined to render their position in the House offensive or noxious, they would thus produce among the Members of the House generally a diminution of any feeling of regret that their absence might cause. He did not think that the question had been placed before the House in a form in which it could be received. With regard to the statement of the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan), he did not appear to be seconded by the other Irish Members.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Louth has made a statement to this House relating to words uttered by the hon. and learned Member for Frome, and the hon. Member has, in the exercise of his right, desired the Clerk at the Table to read the passage complained of. It is the duty of the hon. Member to conclude with some Motion, which may be discussed by the House itself.

MR. SULLIVAN said, he should bow to the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman in the Chair. If he had unwittingly committed an error, he trusted the House would excuse it, as he had been led into it by the precedents which he had already quoted and which showed that the substantive Motion was made in each case by the Prime Minister, who was supposed to have charge of whatever concerned the dignity of the House. Certainly in the case of Mr. O'Connell the Motion was not made by the hon. Member who called attention to the matter. The complaint was made by Viscount Maidstone, who moved no substantive Motion. In the case of Mr. Ferrand the Motion was, he believed, made by the Prime Minister himself, although the question had been raised by another Member. However, he should bow with the utmost deference to any statement which the right hon. Gentleman in the Chair might make on the subject. He begged to move—"That the language contained in the paragraph complained of is a breach of the Privileges of this House."

MR. O'CONNOR POWER, in seconding the Motion, said, he should not have addressed the House, but for the remarks which had just fallen from the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate), who undertook to tell the House that the hon. Member for Louth in bringing forward this Motion was not supported by the Irish Members. He felt therefore constrained to speak upon the question, and to say that, in his opinion, the hon. Member for Louth was only acting as the exponent of the wishes of the whole party in the course he had taken. The best way to form a correct judgment of the character of the remarks made by the hon. and learned Member for Frome would be for every Gentleman in that House to bring the remarks home as applicable to themselves. Let right hon. Gentlemen who sat on the front Treasury Bench ask themselves what their feelings would be if an excited Member of the Home Rule party were to speak of them in an after-dinner speech in Ireland as a "disreputable band." The right hon. Gentlemen opposite would then begin to understand whether or not the Irish Members were over-sensitive in complaining of the language used by the hon. and learned Member for Frome.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the language contained in the paragraph complained of is a breach of the Privileges of this House."—(Mr. Sullivan.)

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN regretted that it had been necessary to bring this Motion before the House, as he had hoped, when a former evening the attention of the hon. and learned Member for Frome (Mr. Lopes) had been called to the words he had used at a dinner party, that the hon. Gentleman would have stated that he did not mean any offence to any Member of the House, and that if any Member was offended by his remarks, he would apologize for and withdraw them. That would have been a manly and an honourable course for the hon. Member to have adopted; and he even hoped that at the eleventh hour, when the present Motion was about to be made, the hon. and learned Member would have obviated the necessity for it by standing up in his place and withdrawing the words he had used. He fully agreed with his hon. Friend the Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) that if this were a solitary case, and if no other speech of the same character had been delivered, it would have been scarcely worth while to bring it under the notice of the House; but, as his hon. Friend had shown, the Anti-Home Rule epidemic also took possession of a number of English Members in the autumn of last year, when speeches were made in which Irish Representatives were insulted in language which was perfectly unjustifiable. In particular, his hon. Friend had alluded to the speeches of the hon. Member for North Lincolnshire (Sir John Astley), of the hon. Member for Oxford (Mr. Hall), and of the hon. Member for Frome (Mr. Lopes). He fully agreed with some of the remarks which fell from the right hon. Gentleman at the head of Her Majesty's Government at the commencement of the Session, to the effect that speeches made by persons of no influence in obscure places, and in dull papers which nobody read, were unworthy of the attention of the House of Commons. But these remarks were inapplicable to the speech made by the hon. Member for Frome on the occasion when, according to his own admission, he uttered the words complained of. His speech was reported in The Times, which could not be called a dull paper, or one which was not generally read. Nor could the hon. and learned Member for Frome be regarded as a person of no influence. He had had the honour of being for at least three Parliaments a Member of the House. He filled the position of magistrate for the county of Wiltshire; he was a member of an honourable profession—one of Her Majesty's Counsel, and Recorder of Exeter; and he was specially chosen by Her Majesty's Government last Session to take charge, as a private Member, of a most important Bill affecting the administration of justice—such a measure as

in ordinary cases would have been taken up by the Solicitor General for the time being. If Her Majesty's Government remained long enough in office—and, for his own part, he thought the late General Election had secured for them not only fixity, but perpetuity of tenure—no doubt the hon. and learned Gentleman would in a short time find himself in the Elysian Fields, and among those Olympian Gods in this country—the members of the High Court of Justice. The important position which the hon. and learned Gentleman occupied in the House justified Members in calling attention to his words. This festival at Frome was not a mere festival given by the hon. Gentleman as Member for the borough. It had been announced in the leading journal as a great political banquet, and it was stated that several distinguished "stars" would be present. A month before it was held, he himself read in The Times that at least two Cabinet Ministers would attend the great Conservative Festival at Frome—namely, the Home Secretary and the First Lord of the Admiralty. Furthermore, it was announced that an invitation had been sent to the right hon. Gentleman at the head of Her Majesty's Government; and many other distinguished persons were named in The Times. On the 10th of January the festival came off, and The Times sent down a Special Correspondent, who reported the proceedings at the length of two columns and a half. A glowing account was given of what occurred. Flags were hung out, and bands of music paraded the town throughout the day. It seemed that there was no room large enough for the banquet, which was held in a monster tent capable of accommodating 1,200 persons. The House of Lords was represented by the Marquess of Bath, and the Government was not represented by the two Cabinet Ministers he had already referred to, but by a Gentleman who would doubtless before long be a member of the Cabinet—his right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board. Letters were read at the meeting from the Secretary of State for the Home Department, and from other distinguished individuals. If at so important a meeting the language complained of was used by the hon. and learned Member for Frome, it was no light matter, and ought not to be passed over in silence. What was the language? It stated distinctly that the Members on the Opposition side of the House who supported the Home Rule movement were a "disreputable band." Was not such language, according to its literal meaning, most offensive to hon. Members on that side of the House? Would not hon. Gentlemen opposite below the Gangway have been justly offended if at an excited meeting in Ireland they had been described as a "disreputable band" who obstructed Irish business? The hon. and learned Gentleman offered no explanation. In his judgment, the manly course would have been to withdraw the words; but in place of doing this, the hon. and learned Gentleman attempted to justify his language by referring to Johnson's Dictionary. The hon. and learned Gentleman was now sitting in silence. He did not know whether the hon. and learned Member was so acting on his own opinion, or at the suggestion of others, but he certainly thought it was not honourable for him to sit silent under the circumstances.

MR. SPEAKER: The right hon. Gentleman has no right to question the honour of any Member of the House.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, he would withdraw the remark—and he thought the hon. and learned Gentleman ought to withdraw the language he made use of at Frome. If the same language were used by a Member in the House, would not the right hon. Gentleman call him to Order, and make him apologize? But as the Speaker could not act on the present occasion, because the language complained of was not uttered in the House, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, who himself took such an interest in the House, would exert his influence to cause the hon. and learned Member for Frome to apologize for his language, and to prevent Irish Members being for the future spoken of, either in the House or out of it, in language tending to excite animosities and feelings of the worst character.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I did not rise before, because I really thought this was an affair which would be easily and not unpleasantly settled. The hon. Member for Louth has had an opportunity of addressing the House at considerable length, and in the vein of glowing rhetoric which we always listen to with pleasure. But I will make this criticism on his speech—that as far as the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Frome is concerned, it was a little too long. It reached those proportions because the hon. Member for Louth introduced circumstances with which we really have not to deal now, and incidents which I hoped had been forgotten. It was really unnecessary, I think, to touch now upon the language used by the hon. Member for North Lincolnshire (Sir John Astley). My recollection is, that he withdrew the expressions which were the subject of complaint; and when an hon. Gentleman acknowledges that he has made a mistake, and has used expressions which, on reflection, he sees are not justified, it is the custom of Gentlemen to forget them. Then we have the case of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Frome. I am not here to deny that it is a breach of Privilege to speak of any Members of this House in their capacity as such in terms which imply disgrace, or, as the hon. Gentleman said, ignominy. But I must remind the House that the expressions here used—when calmly considered—though they may certainly justify notice, are still not of a very extravagant character. Unfortunately, in this country there is a kind of conventional language used during the Recess at public meetings, and on other occasions, which is very different from the language of Parliament, and often differs, indeed, from that of the English language. The Tory Party, for example, are often held up to scorn, in the Recess, as a party particularly given to the practice of bribery and corruption: whereas the Tory Party at the present day are certainly not more liable to that imputation than any other party—and, indeed, if you take an historical survey of their history you find, as a Party, they have been remarkably free from bribery and corruption: not wonderful, as the chief basis of their strength has ever been the landed interest. The Liberal Party, again, at public dinners during the Recess, are often described as a Revolutionary Party, and the wildest and most unconstitutional schemes are freely imputed to them. No doubt the Irish Members in their turn—at least a section of them—are sometimes spoken of in a manner which I do not at all justify, which would not be permitted in this House, or which, if any hon. Member had inadvertently so spoken here, would give rise to the opportunity now offered to my hon. and learned Friend of showing his regret for such language. It is true that a section of the Irish Members some years ago did give us some trouble in the conduct of Public Business, and thereby became subject to the conventional language I have described. I have no reason to say or believe that language of this kind at all applies to hon. Gentlemen who are the advocates in this House of what is called Home Rule. Certainly, at the end of last Session some delay in the progress of Public Business was caused by the line which those Gentlemen took. I am bound to say, however, that in my opinion they were perfectly justified in the course they pursued—though among them there were new Members who may not have acted quite in the Parliamentary spirit which I have no doubt they will learn to appreciate. To maintain that business of importance should not be proceeded with by the House in the form of Continuance Bills was a sound position. It was so recognized by the House. When it was so recognized, the obstructive opposition, up to that point justified, was withdrawn; and I have no doubt that, in opposing the measures of the Government during the present Session, the Irish Members will oppose these measures in a Parliamentary manner, and will do their utmost to meet the wishes and feelings of the House. I will make one more observation, in consequence of what has been said by the hon. Member upon what I have described as the conventional language which obtains during the Recess. It has been said that certain expressions were uttered in the course of “an after-dinner speech,” and the fact that the speech was made after dinner has been held to be almost as “disreputable” as the words themselves. Now, after-dinner speeches are part of the “Manners and Customs of the English People;” and there is no Assembly in the world in which there are more after-dinner speeches than in the House of Commons. It has been my duty to speak frequently during the time I have sat in this House, and I am sure that the majority of the speeches which I have had to intrude upon the House have been after-dinner speeches. I cannot, therefore, admit this as an excuse or a reason for the use, by any Gentleman, of language which is not justified. The hon. Member who spoke second in the debate (Mr. O'Connor Power) asks what we on the front Ministerial Bench should have done if this expression had been used respecting us? Well, Sir, what I should have done—and I think I may say what all my Colleagues would have done—would have been to take no notice of it. At the same time, I do not say that the course we should have pursued ought to prevent Irish Members from receiving the satisfaction to which they are entitled from my hon. and learned Friend, who has now an opportunity, in a full House, of doing that which is, I think, the privilege as well as the duty of an English gentleman when he has done wrong—that which will only cause his friends to respect him the more—I mean, frankly express his regret for having inadvertently given pain to others. I hope that my hon. and learned Friend will now make use of this opportunity—will remove all ill feeling on the part of hon. Gentlemen opposite, on account of his language, and that we shall be able to extricate the House from the painful necessity of making this a question of Privilege.

MR. LOPES: Sir, I should have risen before to say what I am now about to say, if it had not been for the tone and manner of the speech of the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan). When, on Friday last, in answer to a Question, he called upon me to retract the words of which he complained, I felt some difficulty in doing so; and I will shortly state why. I felt that if I had done so, I should, on the one hand, have been admitting the use of words in a sense which I disclaimed; and, on the other, would have been abandoning them in a sense which I avowed. There was another consideration which influenced me—be it right or wrong—and it was this. The question being raised as to whether a breach of Privilege had been committed, I thought it was a dangerous precedent to introduce into this House, that any hon. Member should be at liberty to call any other Member to account for words uttered in the Recess, and with regard to a matter not before Parliament—especially after the hon. Member had distinctly stated that he intended no personal allusion, but that the words merely alluded to the conduct and tactics of a certain Party. These were the grounds on which I acted on that occasion, and I trust that the House will be of opinion that these grounds were not altogether unjustifiable. After what has fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, I will now take a course which I hope will be approved of by the House, and which will be acceptable to the hon. Members who entertain the same views as the hon. Member for Louth. I am prepared to say that if by the use of the word "disreputable" I have caused pain to any hon. Member who holds the particular views to which I have alluded, I much regret that I made use of that word. I am bound, however, to say, in my own exculpation, that the hon. Member for Louth allowed six months to elapse without communicating with me by letter, or in any way whatever, and that he sits in the House for one week after the opening of Parliament, and never verbally or otherwise communicated to me that he had been annoyed by words spoken six months before. On Thursday last he gave Notice of a Question, which he put on Friday, and did not communicate with me till that Notice had been publicly given. Let me, in justice to myself, say that if he had written me a letter to say that he felt annoyance at the words which I had used, I should have immediately withdrawn them. [Mr. SULLIVAN: I wrote a letter to the hon. and learned Member.] If the hon. Member had given me Notice on Thursday, I would have said unreservedly what I have now said to the House. The hon. Member says he gave me notice. He gave me notice in this way. A letter was put into my hands on Thursday evening as I entered, and when I came into the House, Notice of the Question had been publicly given. Surely, when the hon. Member talks about frankness and candour, it would have been more frank and candid if the hon. Member had given me an opportunity of explaining before he brought the matter before the House. I do not propose to make a single remark with regard to the speech of the hon. Member. He has effectually answered himself when he has thought fit to make public in this House the private communications that passed between him and the hon. Baronet the Member for North Lincolnshire. That is a more complete answer to the hon. Member when he talks of frankness and candour, than anything I could say. Again let me say that, if upon that convivial occasion I made use of expressions which caused pain, I regret that I did so, and that if I had anticipated that the words to which exception has been taken would have caused such pain, I would never have used them.

Mr. SULLIVAN said, he would ask the permission of the House to withdraw his Motion. In doing so, not a syllable should fall from him calculated to impair the kindly spirit impressed on the debate by the right hon. Gentleman at the head of Her Majesty's Government, and he should be careful not in any way to retort upon the hon. and learned Member for Frome. He was anxious, however, to remove two serious misconceptions which the hon. and learned Member for Frome appeared to labour under. In the first place, he never had any conversation on this subject, either in private or in public, with the hon. Baronet the Member for North Lincolnshire. In his remarks he was simply referring to the correspondence which had been published in the public Press. In the second place, he wished to set himself right with the House as to the charge of his having shown a want of courtesy to the hon. and learned Member for Frome. The hon. and learned Member had said that the words complained of were used six months ago, and yet no communication had been made to him until the present time. But it was the determination of certain of the Irish Members of that House to call attention to the matter the moment Parliament opened. In justification of the course he had adopted, he deemed it right to explain that it was not until Thursday afternoon that he found that in the absence of another hon. Member he was expected by his hon. Friends to put the Question he had done to the hon. and learned Member for Frome. On receiving this information he had, before drafting the Question, written a letter to the hon. and learned Gentleman, and had left it for him at the door of the House, and then, and then only, he gave Notice of his Question. It might be asked why he did not wait for a day or two to hear from the hon. and learned Gentleman before he gave Notice of his Question. He did not do so, because he had been told, for the first time, that if he had allowed eight days from the sitting of Parliament to elapse before putting the Question, he should be precluded by the Forms of the House from putting it at all. Having explained these two matters, he begged, after what had fallen from the hon. and learned Member for Frome, to withdraw his Motion.

(Mr. Secretary Cross, Mr. Selater-Booth, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson.)

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Secretary Cross.)

MR. STANSFELD said, that in the last Session of Parliament the hon. Member for Hastings (Mr. Kay-Shuttleworth) brought forward a Resolution which had for its object the improvement of the dwellings of the working classes in the metropolis; but it was withdrawn in consequence of the satisfactory statement made in reference to it by the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, and by the Bill now before the House the right hon. Gentleman appeared to be redeeming the promise he made on the occasion referred to. In introducing the measure the right hon. Gentleman anticipated the willing acceptance by the House of what he called the principle of the measure, and he (Mr. Stansfeld) thought the right hon. Gentleman was justified in his anticipation, that the House would receive favourably the objects of the Bill, and that hon. Members on both sides would lend what assistance they could to the Government in putting it into a practical shape. For himself, he could truly say that it was his earnest desire to assist the Government in carrying the Bill, and to put it into such a shape as would insure its efficient working. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, in addressing the House the other day on the subject, had indicated the principles which had guided and, in a certain degree, restricted him in drawing the measure. The right hon. Gentleman said that it was no part of the function or duty of a Government to provide any of the necessaries of life for any class of the population—and among those necessaries the right hon. Gentleman included healthy and decent dwellings for the poor—nor to bring to bear any influences calculated to pauperize our poorer classes. He (Mr. Stansfeld) held that to be a very sound principle; they had a law of general application which was not based on a principle of that kind, and that was the Poor Law, which was the very reverse, because it recognized the right of every inhabitant of the country in want of the necessaries of life to be provided by the guardians. Beyond that, he further thought the enunciation of the principle was very timely made, inasmuch as if the measure were successful, it must prove very expensive in its working, and would result in no slight addition being made to the burdens of the ratepayers. But precisely because of the existence of the Poor Law and because it was necessary that a law of that description should be very stringently administered if they desired not to pauperize in thought and in habits of life the people of the country, they ought to be extremely careful not to bring to bear influences of a similar description upon those who were outside that law. Although that was true, the right hon. Gentleman had proceeded to show that much might be done consistently with sound principles of political economy to raise the standard of healthiness, comfort, and decency of the whole of the working classes and of the poorer classes of the community by the removal of unsuitable and insanitary dwellings and by the substitution of others of a superior character. By raising the character of the average number of dwellings the character of the minimum would also necessarily be raised and the poorer classes would by degrees be led to look for comfort, decency, and healthiness in their homes, and owing to the beneficial effect of such a change and of increased educational influences on their minds, we might eventually be able to leave the result to the natural operation of the law of demand and supply. A certain number of unwholesome houses being razed to the ground and a number of healthy houses being erected in their stead would operate in two ways. In the first place, there would be a number of fit in place of a number of unfit dwellings for the poor, and secondly the character of all similar dwellings in the area would be raised. The machinery of the Government Bill was of a nature familiar to the Local Government Board and to the Home Office, and the object, as he understood it, was to facilitate such large improvements as had taken place under public Acts of Parliament in cities like Glasgow, Edinburgh, and Liverpool, and to advance such operations by substituting for the expensive method of a Private Bill the method of local inquiry, provisional order, and confirming Bills, undertaken by the Home Office or by the Local Government Board as the case might be. The right hon. Gentleman had spoken of the enormous saving of expense which the adoption of this plan would result in to the cities and boroughs which might avail themselves of the provisions of this Bill. For his own part, he (Mr. Stansfeld) was not certain that that sanguine view of the right hon. Gentleman would be borne out; but he freely admitted that the Schedule of the Bill seemed to be a distinct improvement upon the powers of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act. Independently of the question of expense, however, he saw facilities for, and inducements to, action in the fact that under this Bill the Home Office and the Local Government Board would be associated with the local bodies throughout the country in all works of this description. Having expressed a general approval of the objects of the measure, and of the principles laid down by the right hon. Gentleman, he would now deal with the evils to be remedied, and the nature of the legislation that was required to cure them. The extent of those evils might be ascertained from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman and from the Preamble of the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman in his speech referred to two classes of evils—the first being the existence of “crowded districts” and the second being the existence of “groups of houses” or even of single houses existing under conditions making them unsuitable for human habitation, calculated to promote unhealthiness, if not actual disease. In both cases no expenditure of money would make many of such “districts” and “groups” habitable. The ground was in many instances so saturated with everything abominable that nothing could be done unless a clean sweep was made. In corroboration of that statement, the right hon. Gentleman further said that there were not only houses but districts over-crowded; that in some cases the houses were so engrained with disease, that no expenditure of money upon them could make them healthy; and that the only practical way of dealing with them was to take them down. The Preamble of the Bill was equally explicit. It stated that there were in cities and boroughs a great number of houses, courts, and alleys which, by reason of the want of light, air, ventilation, proper convenience, or other causes, were unfit for human habitation and fostered disease and death, not only in those houses, courts, and alleys, but in the neighbourhoods in which they were situated. Those evils the right hon. Gentleman proposed to deal with; but when he passed from the speech of the Home Secretary and the Preamble to the enacting clauses—and he referred specially to the 3rd clause—he was struck by the strange falling-off in the phraseology. So great was the difference that he could not help feeling there must have been some change or uncertainty of purpose when the enacting clauses were being drawn. If hon. Members would compare the wording of the 3rd clause with the intention of the Government as expressed in the Preamble, they would find that while the speech of the right hon. Gentleman and the Preamble contemplated dealing not only with large areas, but also with groups of houses and single houses, whenever the conditions affecting them were injurious to the inhabitants or to the neighbourhood, the 3rd clause was entirely confined to this case—namely, that it was necessary to discover “a certain area” whose condition and character was such that it became advisable and necessary that the whole of the area should be taken by compulsory powers and covered by new streets and buildings. He had been unable to see what advantage could be gained by this clause, which would not deal with groups of houses or isolated houses. If this clause should not be amended, the right hon. Gentleman would, after all, be conferring hardly any additional powers on the urban sanitary authorities of the country, because under the Public Health Act of 1848, the Local Government Act of 1858, and the Act of 1866, streets could be widened and new streets made through any part of the areas within the jurisdiction of those authorities, and the judicial interpretation put upon the word "street" was "a roadway with houses on both sides." He had, however, so much faith in the statement of the wishes and objects of the right hon. Gentleman that he was full of hope that if the criticisms he had ventured to offer were found to be sound, the right hon. Gentleman would see his way to amending that clause so as to make it more in accordance with the objects set forth in the Preamble of the Bill. There were other Amendments of perhaps less importance to which he might point, but which he would defer alluding to until the Committee stage was reached. One observation, however, he thought it right to make. The success of the measure must very largely depend on the cost of carrying it into operation, and therefore he had looked at the Compensation Clause with considerable anxiety and interest. The right hon. Gentleman had taken a sound view in saying that no more than the fair market value should be given to the owners of property to be levelled under the provisions of the Act. But he would suggest for consideration that if the principle were applied without any further precautions than those expressed in the Bill, the Government might find that it would not operate as they wished—it would operate rather to give more than justice to the owners of certain properties, and less than justice to the ratepayers of the localities. They must remember that in many cases the houses to be dealt with would be property in a condition which the existing law condemned. They all knew that the return of capital invested in this poor class of tenements was very much larger than that invested in better houses. He therefore trusted that the Government would not allow owners of property who were not sufficiently conscious of their duties to profit by their own wrong. If houses were in a condition which the existing Sanitary Acts condemned, he thought provision should be made in the Compensation Clause to make a reduction from the prima facie market value of such property, on the hypothesis that it was fairly chargeable for the amount necessary to put it in a state which the existing sanitary law of the country demanded. If that were done he thought the Bill would leave them with very general assent, and would be a piece of legislative sanitary work creditable to the Government and satisfactory to the House.

SIR SYDNEY WATERLOW said, that all those who took an interest in the permanent welfare of the working classes and desired to see them raised and elevated in the social scale would, he thought, rejoice to find that the Government had given the House such an early opportunity of criticizing the measure by which they proposed to deal with the important question with which the Bill dealt practically and effectually—namely, that of removing the evils of overcrowding not only in the metropolis, but also in the various large towns of the country. The opportunity afforded during the last few days of a careful examination of its clauses had satisfied him that if it was to have any real effect in removing those terrible evils which arose from overcrowding in badly-constructed, ill-ventilated houses, many of the clauses would require considerable alteration. The Bill was, unfortunately, to too great extent a Permissive Bill. The district medical officer might report to the vestry that a certain area was unhealthy; then the local authority might or might not determine that the prevalence of disease in the district was reasonably to be attributed to the closeness of the houses, and the confirming authority was to inquire as to the correctness of the official representation; and, finally, Parliament must determine whether the Provisional Order ought, or ought not, to be confirmed. As the Bill stood, therefore, it depended entirely on the discretion and will of the district medical officer whether it was operative or inoperative. He was quite aware that there was a clause permitting the Board of Works, with the consent of a Secretary of State, to appoint a duly qualified officer to make a special inquiry; but that placed the Board in a very invidious position. Its members were elected by the vestries, and it would not be a pleasant task for them to initiate an inquiry for the purpose of reviewing the decisions of those whom they represented. If the Bill was to work, time to be saved, and the Metropolitan Board to be free to act whenever and wherever required, their own officer should be appointed to make the necessary official representation in the first instance. The vestries could not complain of that, as the Metropolitan Board were to find the money, and they might be safely trusted to initiate the improvement schemes and to determine the unhealthy districts in which the improvements were to be carried out. If this course were taken the district medical officers would be relieved from what would frequently be a very embarrassing position. The vestrymen constantly endeavoured to exercise considerable control over those officers, and were frequently the owners of, or largely interested in, small house property in their own districts, and strongly objected to have it interfered with. Again, he could not see why it should be necessary to have 20 persons to complain of the unhealthy condition of any particular area. In many cases it would be difficult to get so many persons to act together, and he trusted the right hon. Gentleman would have no objection to make a reduction in the number. If it were necessary to remove a disorderly house in any court or street, it was sufficient for two persons to complain, and five persons would be amply sufficient in the case of an unhealthy district, instead of 20. Under Clause 5, the scheme of a local authority was to provide for the accommodation of as many persons as should be displaced. He presumed that meant that sites should be provided for the erection of dwellings for as many persons; but he trusted that in Committee the House would consent to insert the words "at least" as many persons. Schemes of the kind proposed must be prepared and carried out with a view to the future, even more than the present, condition of the metropolis. The population was rapidly increasing, the accommodation to be now provided might be found insufficient 25 years hence, and if the new buildings were properly designed it was easy enough to arrange for the accommodation of twice or thrice as many persons to the statute acre as there were at present, and to secure at the same time the best possible sanitary arrangements. He could point out several blocks of workmen's dwellings in London, six or seven stories high, where there were more than 1,600 persons to the statute acre and perfect through-ventilation in every room. Perhaps the most important clause in the Bill was the one which directed the manner in which the scheme was to be carried out after the properties had been acquired; and here again the permissive principle was introduced. The local authority might sell or let all or any part of the property for the purposes intended; but the whole object of the Bill was that they should sell or let subject to the conditions laid down. If they only sold or let a part there seemed no provision for dealing with the remainder. Probably the Home Secretary would consent in Committee to the modification of this clause, with the view of bringing it more into accord with existing legislation—namely, Clause 49 of the Metropolitan Streets Improvement Act, 1872. One part of the subject did not appear to be definitely dealt with in the Bill. The medical officer was to report that a certain area was unhealthy owing to the closeness, narrowness, and bad arrangement of the streets and houses. That state of things would generally be found in the courts and alleys at the back of some of our leading thoroughfares. The public outside saw the glittering lights of the gin-palaces, and the beautiful plate-glass windows of the tradesmen's shops, but they knew but little of the overcrowding, the misery, and the wretchedness in the old and worn-out lodging-houses in the rear. If these were to be removed and the area improved and properly ventilated, a new thoroughfare must be driven from the main street. That would necessitate the removal of some valuable property, the sites of which should be let or sold for commercial purposes, if the improvement were to be carried out at the minimum cost. Some provision should be inserted in the Bill for dealing with this kind of property, and a question must arise whether the owners of such property were not entitled to the usual 10 per cent for compulsory sale, as compared with the owners of houses unfit for occupation and increasing the death-rate and disease-rate of the locality. A tradesman selling adulterated food might be fined and the food seized, but the man who let a house, spreading disease among the inhabitants, should be satisfied with the provision in the Bill which gave him the market price of his property. Clause 16 permitted the local authority to borrow on the security of the lands acquired. That, he thought, would very much interfere with the prompt execution of the scheme. It would certainly be cheaper and more simple to borrow on the rates, for if the land were mortgaged no one would build until the mortgage was released. A further difficulty arose from the fact that it would prevent persons who were desirous of borrowing money from the Public Works Loan Commissioners, for the purpose of building improved dwellings on the land in question, from doing so, for the Commissioners would not lend money on mortgaged land. It was gratifying to find that the Bill proposed to give authority to the Public Works Loan Commissioners to advance money for the purchase of the lands at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent interest, the capital to be repaid over a period of 40 years. The Commissioners now charged the companies erecting workmen's dwellings 4 per cent, redeemable in 40 years, necessitating a net return of £5 1s. per cent. The lower rate would be a great advantage. It was almost impossible to build tenements for the lowest class, and secure a return of £5 1s. per cent. The reduction of the rate and increase of the time for repayment would enable building companies to make a corresponding reduction in the rents—say, from 2s. per room per week to 1s. 9d. or 1s. 10d. When the Bill was before the House last week, a strong opinion was expressed that the lowest class of day-labourers were not benefited by the erection of the new dwellings, and that only a small percentage of them were able to secure the new and improved accommodation. No doubt, that statement was to a great extent correct; but he ventured to say, from some years' practical experience, that the lowest and poorest class were benefited in the only way in which, with a due regard to the future, they could be benefited. The steady labourer, the hardworking artizan—in fact, the respectable portion of the poorest, were only too glad to remove at once into the new tenements, leaving their neighbours more room, more breathing space, and lower rates, consequent on the increased demand. The House must look hopefully to the future of the working classes, believing that before another 50 years had passed away every family might be able to secure what was regarded as a first-class tenement, and that the back slums of to-day might be matters of history only. He hoped after the second reading had passed some time would be allowed to elapse before the Bill went into Committee, in order that hon. Members might discuss the various clauses with persons interested, and see how they would affect them.

MR. RITCHIE said, he rose to congratulate the Government upon having at the earliest possible moment redeemed the pledge given last Session. He was glad that that should be the first of the Government measures which came on for a second reading, and he believed that the Home Secretary had only endorsed the feeling of the country, which had been strongly impressed with the urgent necessity for such a measure. If the young were to grow up in moral and physical strength, the courts and alleys which bred disease and death in so many towns must be rooted out. The 1st clause confined the operation of the Bill to large towns and cities; but he saw no reason why, if it were of any good at all, it should not be equally good for small towns and villages. He had been in small towns where there was just as much necessity for the Bill as there was in London; and he had been in some country districts, where the dwellings of some of the labouring classes were to the full as bad as anything of the kind which he had seen in any town in England. In one village with which he was acquainted there was a row of houses in the main road leading from the railway station to a village which was a nest of disease and infamy. Attempts had been made to buy these houses; but they brought such large rentals, and the price demanded for them was so high, that it had been as yet impossible to remove the nuisance. Under Clause 3 the medical officer must be satisfied of the existence of the evil, and then the local authority must be convinced, first, of the truth of his representations; secondly, the practicability of the remedy; thirdly, the sufficiency of their resources; and, lastly, the advantage to be derived to the district. But what appeal or remedy was left to the ratepayers, supposing that the medical officer was not satisfied of the existence of the evil, or if the local authorities were not convinced in regard to the four conditions necessary to action? He would suggest that, if the decision of the medical officer and of the local authority were against anything being done in a particular case, it should be open to a certain number of ratepayers to appeal to the Secretary of State; and further, that when it was proposed to remove more than 500 persons, a certificate should be given that suitable accommodation existed for them in the immediate neighbourhood. He failed to see in the Bill any provision for the housing of the people who were to be turned out of their homes in the first instance; but the Glasgow Act did not contain a provision to meet the case and to prevent people being turned out into the streets. It would be expedient to enable local authorities to do what had been done in Glasgow for the migratory class. Common lodging houses were often indecently overcrowded and unhealthy; the Corporation of Glasgow had provided suitable accommodation for 300 males and 100 females, at a charge, first of 3*d.* and now 3½*d.* each per night; and that had been done without any cost to the ratepayers, for the income produced a return of 5 per cent on the outlay. Satisfactory as that result was, it was equally satisfactory as regarded the health and cleanliness of the lodgers, and he therefore trusted the Home Secretary would find himself able to adopt something calculated to work in the way he proposed.

MR. WADDY said, that when the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary introduced his Bill the other evening, he had no reason to complain of the welcome accorded to it on both sides of the House, and he (Mr. Waddy) believed that the same cheerful acclaim would be given to it during the several stages which it was destined to pass. If, therefore, he found fault with it now, it was not for the purpose of opposing the second reading, but because he thought examination showed that there were many deficiencies that would have to be supplied, and it would facilitate the progress of the Bill if the right hon. Gentleman would adopt some of the suggestions that were made to him, so as to obviate the necessity of their being moved by way of Amendment. There appeared to be a wide difference between the apparent intention of the Preamble and the Bill itself. He maintained that provision was not made in the Bill for the class of persons referred to in the Preamble. The description which was given was not applicable to the ordinary run of the working classes. It was very true that there were in many cities and boroughs places unfit for human habitation, but many of the people who lived in them were not able to pay higher rents if a better class of dwellings were substituted. He called attention to the 3rd section to show how vain it was to expect the local authorities would move. The medical officers might be prepared to do their duty with earnestness and loyalty to their office. They would report to the local authorities, who would take the representations into consideration. If they were satisfied of the truth of the representations and the practicability of applying a remedy, and if they were satisfied of the efficiency of the resources—which they never would be so long as the money had to be got from the ratepayers—and if they were further satisfied of the advantage to be derived in the district within their jurisdiction, then they were to do this, that, and the other. The difficulty would be in driving the unwilling horse to the water and getting him to drink. There were remedies already existing for many of the objects sought to be attained by the Bill. There was a remedy for overcrowding, and if that were not properly applied, for the very same reason the local authorities would not be driven to carry out the provisions of this Bill. The people of Glasgow had carried out their scheme loyally, honourably, and well, no doubt, but the result of their evictions, and the substitution of new dwellings, was this—that the rent paid in the old houses was 9*s.* 7*d.* as against 11*s.* 6*d.*, and 11*s.* 5*d.* as against 18*s.* 1*d.* in the new buildings. There was an increase of 20 per cent in the rent of one apartment, of 20 per cent in two apartments, of—if it were not a misprint—58 per cent on a dwelling of three apartments, and of 28 per cent on one of four apartments. The same result was apparent in the case of the Waterlow and Peabody Buildings in the City of London, where the charges ranged from 5*s.* 6*d.* to 8*s.* 6*d.*; whereas, from inquiries made within the last few days, he had found in the City many houses with four rooms, and one family in each, paying rents in the front of 2*s.* 6*d.* and 2*s.*, and at the back of 1*s.* 9*d.* and 1*s.* 6*d.* per week. The fact was, the Bill did not go the full length that he wished. It did not substitute other places for those that were pulled down, but gave dwellings of quite a superior character. Of what use was it to tell the poor people who were evicted that they should have a handsomer lodging, if they paid more than they could afford to pay? It was Tantalus improved. They could not scrape together the money which was wanted for this extra rent. In some respects the remedy might be worse than the disease. The Waterloo Buildings and the Peabody Buildings were altogether out of the reach of many of those people who were evicted. Nor could persons who were not of a certain respectability have apartments in those buildings, even at an increased rent; for an inspector was sent to their former lodgings to report upon the state of their furniture. He, therefore, said they were not dealing with the stratum of society which they ought to provide for. He did not mean to obstruct the Bill. So far as it went, it was an admirable Bill; but they must take care that they were addressing themselves to the necessity which really existed. In the case of the Peabody Buildings, they had had a glorious sum of money to handle, and the matter had been dealt with on principles of philanthropy, so that a large income for the capital was not required. If the Home Secretary was prepared to do something of that kind, he might tempt people to build houses under the Bill which would answer somewhat the objects they had in view. Practically the Waterloo and Peabody Buildings swallowed up the rents of the ground and first floors with the expenses of the ground rent, rates, and taxes, and for the repayment of capital and other outgoings the proprietors were obliged to rely on the floors above. Moreover, what were they doing with these new buildings? They were carrying them to heights far beyond safe and healthy proportions. It was held that the height of houses should not be greater than the width of the street by their side, but these model buildings far overtopped that proportion; and in the course of not many years we should be astonished at ourselves for allowing these buildings to be built, and for being rather proud of them than otherwise. If a fever or an epidemic were to break out in one of these blocks, it would run like fire from end to end, and the catastrophe would be all the greater from the means taken in building them to feed the disease. He protested against the application of the Bill being confined merely to London and large towns. That would undoubtedly prove a drawback to its usefulness. His earnest advice was that the Government should give the same facilities and privileges to the country as were proposed to be given to towns. There was quite as great need for active measures being taken in the country as elsewhere. It was absurd to try and cleanse the urban districts by means of such a measure, and leave the rural districts to fester and breed fever and all manner of complaints. It might be said that if it were extended to country districts, they would have to fall back on Imperial taxation. Well, he was prepared to justify that course. Fears were in certain quarters entertained that if the principle of the measure were extended as far as he advocated, the people would be pauperised. That was a mere apprehension, and had no foundation in fact. They were paupers already. ["No!"] They were not paupers in the strict legal sense, that he was willing to admit, but for all purposes of paying their way, and living in the manner proposed, they were paupers. Parliament, therefore, must be prepared to deal with the question in a great measure on principles of philanthropy. There were many places in the country, where there ought to be sweet air, which were quite as insanitary as any in London; and now, while they were preparing to improve one place here and another there in the large towns, there were 10 bad places for every one of these springing up every day in the rural districts. When it was remembered that London was not inhabited by Londoners only, but also by people from the country, and that there was a constant influx into the metropolis of persons from all portions of the Kingdom, it would appear perfectly fair that this should be made a matter, not of local, but Imperial taxation. This he said, not because he was opposed to the Bill, or to the great improvement it sought to carry out. He was actuated in his objections simply by the fact that he desired to see a complete, and not a skeleton, measure passed. He desired by every means in his power to help the Government to sweep away a gigantic evil, but he desired it to be done thoroughly. The Bill was a well-meant effort for the suppression of disease, for the abatement of immorality, and for the general alleviation of the health, comfort, and well-being of the people, and as such he supported it, though it was incomplete, and much too limited in its application.

SIR JAMES HOGG said, that the short time which had elapsed since the Bill was printed made it quite impossible for him to give the opinions on this subject of the local authorities who would be charged with carrying out its provisions. He could assure the House, however, that they would be most happy to aid in carrying into effect any measure which had for its object the improvement of the dwellings of the poorer classes. Speaking for himself, he would say he thought the great question was how to make the matter pay. The question of cost seemed the most important part of the Bill. The machinery to effect an eviction appeared somewhat cumbrous, and the Bill was deficient in this—that it contained no provisions for taking away buildings which were not in an insanitary condition. If they wanted really to improve, they must have power to take property which was not insanitary, if only for the purpose of making better approaches to the improvements proposed by the Bill. He maintained, in opposition to the view of the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down, that it was no part of the business of Parliament to do anything towards providing the necessaries of life for the people, and that the works effected under the measure should be of a purely commercial character. He approved the provision which would secure a standing arbitrator, for anyone who had had to do with compensations must be aware how useful such a provision would be. The Bill had been only a short time before them for consideration; but he believed that the Board over which he presided did not object to the second reading.

MR. RATHBONE said, the hon. and learned Member for Barnstaple (Mr. Waddy) had assumed that people lived in the fever nests which it was the object of the Bill to get rid of, because they were unable to pay for better habitations. He (Mr. Rathbone) believed, on the contrary, that a large number of those persons chose to remain in these wretched dens from carelessness, or because they made, in a great measure, the public-house their home. Nor could he agree with the hon. and learned Member in thinking that there would be no disposition on the part of the municipalities to use the powers which this Bill would confer upon them. He was grateful to the Government and to the right hon. Gentleman for having undertaken to deal with a great evil. The Bill was a declaration by the Government, which he hoped would be backed by the still higher authority of Parliament, that it was the duty of the great towns to undertake in earnest the abatement of that evil of overcrowding from which so much of the disease and so much of the immorality of our population arose. It called attention also to the powers that now existed for dealing with these evils, and strengthened those powers, and, moreover, it removed out of the way that which in Liverpool had been found to be practically the great difficulty in carrying out these improvements—the enormous cost of obtaining the necessary land. To his mind the Schedule which did that was the most valuable part of the Bill. On the 19th of last month the Association of Municipal Bodies came to a resolution to memorialize Government in regard to “the present cumbrous, dilatory, and costly mode of proceeding to acquire property required by sanitary authorities for street improvements.” He had seen a draft of their memorial, and it would, no doubt, be satisfactory to the Home Secretary to know that his Bill, with some modifications in detail, anticipated to a very large extent what the united municipalities of this country were going to ask for. At the same time, he thought it would be no little encouragement to the House to grant such increased powers, if it looked to the effect which had been produced even by the imperfect and very expensive powers already given. He found from the report of the admirable medical officer of Liverpool, Dr. Trench, that although Liverpool had a larger number of inhabitants to the acre than any other large town, its population having been 98·9 to the acre in 1873, yet there were five towns, some of them with nothing like the same density of population, in which the death-rate was higher in the year to which the report referred (1872) than in Liverpool. He could not help attributing this, in part at least, to the very active measures which had been taken in Liverpool to improve the dwellings. While thanking the Home Secretary heartily for the present Bill, he ventured to suggest that alterations might be made in some of the clauses which would remove practical difficulties that would arise from working the measure in its present shape. Clause 5 had struck him as unworkable, and he had asked the opinion of the Liverpool Town Clerk, who had written to him as follows:—

“It would be impracticable in the worst class of cases to carry out any scheme to comply with this clause. A proportion of the population must necessarily be ‘displaced;’ and it would be very injudicious, even with the help of block dwellings, to replace the whole population within the area, or in the vicinity. The clause is also not consistent with another provision prohibiting the sanitary authority from erecting buildings without the sanction of the Local Government Board. The provision should be—‘And shall show how such a proportion of the working-classes displaced as shall be satisfactory, &c.’”

He would, for the present, allude to only two other suggestions. The most overcrowded places and the foulest fever nests in our large towns were often in the immediate vicinity of docks, warehouses, offices, manufactories, and shops. Ultimately a considerable part of the land on which the dwellings in question were built would be taken for business purposes, and its owners too often cared little as to its state so long as it paid a moderate interest until it was so wanted. Now, if the provision in the last paragraph of Clause 7 was retained, it would be rendered practically impossible, because too expensive, to carry the provisions of this Bill into operation as regarded that land. By insisting on the continued appropriation, without limit, of such land for working-class dwellings, the prospective value of the land would be destroyed, and it would become too expensive to use it for artizans’ dwellings at all. Besides such a provision was quite unnecessary. The other suggestion he would make was, that the Bill should take wider powers to remove all impediments in the way of the flow of capital in the direction of this work of erecting and improving the dwellings of the working-classes. It was not merely in the way of demolishing existing dwellings and building new ones in their stead, but in the way of improving those which existed and the conditions under which they were inhabited that something ought to be done. That was a process which would be more rapid in its effects, and experiments had shown that it might be done to a considerable extent and with considerable profit. It had, for instance, been carried out in London, where Miss Hill, who now had no less than 3,000 tenants, having bought property which was overcrowded or mismanaged and placed it under better management and under restrictions as to the number of people who should occupy a certain given area, and that had been found most successful. These efforts would be much facilitated, if a great deal of capital which was now prevented from finding such occupation could be set at liberty to do so. He alluded to the large funds in the hands of trustees for charitable purposes, and which by the existing law, were obliged to be invested in Consols. Now, if such funds could be invested in this sort of property, as well as in the public stocks, on such conditions and with such guarantees as would insure to the trustees an income equal to that which they were now deriving, great good might be done. He ventured to say it was possible, and he would suggest that power should be given to the Court of Chancery to sanction such investments.

Mr. SALT said, he wished to thank the Home Secretary for having introduced the measure. In considering it, the first question they had to ask themselves was, whether the Bill would really be as operative and practical as was intended; or whether, by some accident, much of its power might not be destroyed. He should be inclined to say that the Bill was deficient in working power. He did not quite see where the strength lay which was to bring it into practical operation. He alluded to the 4th clause, by which the initiative was given to the medical officer. Considering the circumstances connected with the position of that functionary, and also how different his views might be in different localities, it was very doubtful whether that was the machinery which would give the best impulse to the Bill at its starting. He would suggest whether, in the first instance, all the local authorities might not be required to present a report as to the condition of the particular area over which they had the control, and the way in which they proposed to meet the necessities of that area. They would have, by that means, a definite commencement of the work, and in the course of 12 or 18 months they might collect from reliable and responsible authorities, in all the towns to which the measure applied, a mass of suggestions and information of the greatest interest and value in regard to future operations. Again, it was impossible to form any idea as to what amount of expense would be incurred under the Bill—a very serious matter indeed in connection with the most difficult and troublesome questions of local taxation. As the measure now stood, they might in some places have a medical officer with curious or extravagant notions about health, together with a weak local authority, and the result might be that the ratepayers would be put to enormous expense in building palaces where nothing of the sort was required. It might very often be better not to pull down and rebuild at immense cost, but to repair and improve existing buildings. If they had before them the reports from all the local authorities of the country to which he had referred, they might be able to ascertain with some degree of accuracy what outlay it would be necessary to make, how much would be raised by private enterprize, and what amount would be thrown on the rates. But at present they would be taking a leap altogether in the dark; and after all their talk for years past about local taxation and the difficulties of the ratepayers, they should be careful how they plunged into an expenditure which absolutely knew no bounds. In entering on an enterprize of that kind, it was a wise rule to look around and see who had been working in that direction already, and working most successfully. He did not know that those who had been most successful in that way were the local bodies mentioned in the 1st and 2nd clauses of the Bill. If those bodies had had any building to do, they had generally been engaged in effecting large street improvements, rather than in providing more convenient dwellings for the poor. Those who had had most practical experience, and who had been most successful in the latter class of operations in the metropolis, were the men so well represented by the hon. Member for Maidstone (Sir Sydney Waterlow) and the Trustees of the Peabody Fund. Therefore it had occurred to him whether it might not be possible to bring the efforts of those societies into far more definite and immediate play than was done by that Bill. If those societies wanted to work under the Bill, they had various local bodies to go to, and various impediments to overcome, which it was desirable to reduce as much as possible in order to attract a nymph so coy as capital was. The difficulty at present experienced by those societies was, not to get money, but to get sites for building purposes; and if facilities were given for obtaining sites, they would easily obtain the capital they wanted. He would therefore suggest—though he did it with some trepidation, because it might be impracticable—that one or two of the strongest and best managed of those societies should be incorporated, with powers to take land compulsorily. Those powers might easily be regulated and controlled, and then they would secure a machinery to do their work which had been tested by practical experience, rather than local boards, which possibly did not care a straw about the matter. He agreed, to a certain extent, with the theory of the Bill, that no extraordinary and special compensation should be given to the owners of unwholesome dwellings when compelled to sell them; but he did not like to see it so directly expressed in the Bill, seeing that it was inconsistent with the general practice as regarded property which the owners had been compelled to give up. He had always thought it a very fair principle in their legislation, when land was taken for public purposes by compulsion, that the private owner should receive compensation for that compulsion. However, he acknowledged that in nearly every case in which land would be taken compulsorily under the Bill he would be indisposed to award any extra price at all. But that was a very different thing from stereotyping a new idea into an Act of Parliament. He believed that few arbitrators would think of giving more than the market value for houses that were in a bad condition; but it was difficult to ascertain what was the market value of such property, which differed from day to day; and injustice might be done, if the arbitrator took the market value at the particular moment when it was exceptionally low, or exceptionally high. Every one would agree that those who infringed the law by not keeping their houses in a proper state ought not to have a premium on the value of their property, but his answer to that was—"Let the law be enforced against those persons, and compel them to remove nuisances." He doubted whether it was wise to import by Act of Parliament a little bit of charity into a business transaction. Another question was, whether the Bill ought not to be applicable to places somewhat smaller than those now included in it, and where there were houses in a very unhealthy condition. It was of the greatest importance that the local authority should be able to grapple with the evil with which the Bill dealt as soon as possible, so that it might be eradicated at the earliest stage, before excessive overcrowding had occurred, and when it was possible to obtain sites for building at a reasonable cost.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE said, that as one of those who in the last Session had called attention to the subject, he would take that opportunity of expressing his satisfaction that Her Majesty's Government had taken up the question, and had brought in the present measure. The essential feature of the Bill—that of giving power to local bodies for the taking of land compulsorily—formed part of the Bill of the hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. W. M. Torrens) in 1868, and he thought the hon. Gentleman must look with satisfaction to the recognition of the principle of his measure. That Bill, though passed unanimously by the House of Commons, was deprived of the principle in question in its passage through the House of Lords, and, although in its maimed condition, it had not produced all that was expected of it, he could not but think it contained a very valuable principle—namely, that owners of house property should be compelled to keep dwellings belonging to them in proper order and in a habitable condition. It might be easy for the Government to pass the Bill; but, after all, the true measure of success would not be the carrying of a measure, but the extent to which it would afterwards be put into operation by the local authorities. The danger attending it was the fear of expense felt by the ratepayers of the large towns, who were quite as sensitive to the burden of local taxation as people living in country districts, for whom hon. Members opposite had so much consideration. The observations, therefore, he would make would be directed to the possibility of reducing those expenses. The first point he had to deal with was the necessity, under the Bill, for the improvement schemes to come before Parliament for confirmation. He understood that when these schemes had been confirmed by the Local Government Board, or it might be the Home Office, the Government would take charge of them as Provisional Orders to the extent of supporting the second reading, after which they would go before a Committee in the usual manner. Now, there might be considerable danger of local boards having to submit to heavy costs before Parliamentary Committees. There was a time when Provisional Orders were almost sacred; but of late years, and especially since three Acts had come into operation which he had succeeded in passing when at the Board of Trade—namely, those relating to Tramways and Gas and Water schemes—he believed agents and lawyers had found that there was a good deal to be made out of schemes of that kind, and that, consequently, these Bills were not so free from opposition as they had formerly been. He thought that was a danger which was well worthy of consideration by his right hon. Friend opposite (the Home Secretary). It might, therefore, be well to provide that these schemes should be dealt with in the same way as schemes under the Endowed Schools Act, by being laid on the Table, and being thrown out only by a direct vote of the House, without going before a Select Committee at all; or a strict rule might be laid down with respect to the amount of costs before Committees. At present, he understood costs in the case of opposition could only be granted when the Members of the Committee were unanimously of opinion that the opposition had been frivolous. But inasmuch as schemes of this kind would come before Committees after having been investigated by a Government officer on the spot, any opposition that might be made before the Committee would be in the nature of an appeal; and it might be advisable, therefore, in the event of such opposition before a Committee being unsuccessful, to grant costs against the appellant. He threw out these suggestions for the right hon. Gentleman's consideration. Another matter bearing upon the same point was the power of disposing of the unsanitary districts bought by the local authorities under the powers of the Bill. Might it not in some cases be advisable that some other dwellings than those intended for artizans should be erected upon the spaces thus secured? He threw out this suggestion, because it appeared to him that the schemes undertaken should, within reasonable bounds, be made as profitable as possible to local authorities, in order that the strongest objection to the working of the Bill—that of its cost to the ratepayers—might be removed or lessened. Under the Bill, as it at present stood, it was the local medical officer who practically determined what property should be included in the scheme, and the scheme itself was entirely confined to houses in an insanitary condition. No discretion was allowed to the local authority to include within its operations any houses or land that might be necessary to make the scheme workable; but it might be necessary to give proper access to the area dealt with, or to include certain other land in the immediate neighbourhood which was required to make the scheme a paying one, and he thought considerable discretion should be allowed to the local authority for that purpose. By driving new streets through the areas proposed to be dealt with, it was quite possible to raise considerably the value of the surrounding property, and if that was also acquired the local authorities would be able to some extent to recoup themselves for their outlay. This had been the experience of Glasgow, and similar results were met with in the United States. The Legislative Bodies of some of the States, such as those of Massachusetts and New York, had even gone so far as to declare that when an improvement scheme had augmented the value of property in the neighbourhood, an arbitrator should assess the additional value, which should then go to the credit of the Improvement Fund. He thought that was a sound principle, for inasmuch as an additional value would be given to adjoining properties, the owners of such properties should be subjected to a portion of the cost, and it was only fair and reasonable that the ratepayers should not have the whole of the burden of the improvements cast upon them. As to the success of these measures, a friend in Boston had written to him to say that, although he had been much opposed to them at first as interfering unduly with the rights of property, he was obliged to admit that they had been productive of great benefit, and that by the adoption of the principle many schemes had been carried into effect which before would have been utterly hopeless. It was not probable that the right hon. Gentleman would be able to incorporate the principle in his Bill, but it was one well worthy of consideration as being calculated to effect, at little cost, great and much-needed improvements in the larger towns. As to the mode of assessing the value of property under the Bill, he quite agreed that where this unsanitary property was taken, there should not be the usual addition to the value on account of the property being taken compulsorily, and indeed he thought that there should be some further limitation as to the value to be given. If the property was in such bad condition as to come within the operation of the Bill, he thought that the owners were hardly entitled to receive the full value of it, and if the full market value were given them, in many cases too high an amount would be paid. He thought, therefore, it would be well to include in the present Bill a clause limiting the power of the arbitrators when determining upon the value of properties, and calling upon them to take into consideration the sanitary or unsanitary condition of the houses with which they were dealing. Further, he thought that as the Bill would, if passed, lay an entirely new charge upon the ratepayers, the Government would do well to consider the advisability of calling upon the ground landlords in the metropolis and the great towns of the country to bear a portion of the expense, more especially when they considered that their property would, by reason of the improvements, greatly increase in value. He made these suggestions in no hostile or captious spirit, but in the hope that the Bill might be productive of all the good its promoters desired.

MR. GRIEVE said, he had already placed a Notice on the Paper to the effect that this measure should be applicable to Scotland, and he had now to make an urgent appeal to the right hon. Gentleman that he would comply with the request. In the borough he had the honour to represent there were localities he would not venture to describe to the House—it was sufficient for him to say there were confined spaces where fever, epidemic, and all sorts of filth and iniquity prevailed, and the inhabitants had long wished for such a measure as now brought forward by the right hon. Gentleman. He had already sent down the Bill to the local authority, and he ventured to say, no time would elapse before he should have urgent Petitions to that House in favour of the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman was in Scotland during the Recess and he (Mr. Grieve) confidently appealed to him to say what he saw in Glasgow and Edinburgh as to the working of the local acts of those cities. He was quite sure the authorities of Glasgow and Edinburgh would hail with satisfaction the introduction of a general measure, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would favourably consider his proposal.

SIR SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, he agreed to a very great extent with what had been said by the hon. and learned Member for Barnstaple (Mr. Waddy). There were two ideas running through the Bill which seemed to jostle one another in the mind of the draftsman, but the two were altogether different. The first idea was implied in the title "The Artizans Dwellings Bill." That title showed that the draftsman rather had in view what arose where, for public improvements, large clearances were made, and many working people were dispossessed of their dwellings. Side by side with that there seemed to be the question, with which they were all desirous to deal, and that was the clearing away of fever nests. These two subjects, however, must be dealt with in very different ways. As to the first of them, he entirely agreed with what was said in the opening speech upon the introduction of the Bill, that it was no part of the duty of a Government to provide houses for other persons, and that any such transaction must be treated in a very great degree as a commercial question. The enterprise into which the local authority was called upon to enter therefore should be self-supporting. That was the case when they were providing houses for those who were well able to pay for them. But in clearing unhealthy districts which caused disease and crime, it was only just that the local ratepayers, who would be largely benefited by the process, should be called upon to bear a proportion of the expense, and that this branch of the question should not be regarded as a purely commercial matter. He thought the Bill would be totally inapplicable to those cases where it was requisite to provide habitations for men who were removed from old dwellings in consequence of improvement. It would be most absurd to give compulsory powers to a railway company, for instance, to take property and turn people out of their houses, and then immediately to give compulsory powers to the local authority to take possession of property in order to find habitations for those who had been already displaced by compulsory powers. Everyone who knew the condition of that metropolis was aware that portions of some of the larger estates were occupied by an inferior class of houses, that those houses were so circumstanced that the neighbourhood was unhealthy, and that consequently the property around was seriously deteriorated. Now this Bill proposed to give the local authority compulsory powers to take possession of those unhealthy areas; but why should not compulsory powers be given to the owners of property to remove plague spots from their estates? An owner of property where improvement was necessary ought to be enabled to call upon the local authority to contribute a certain portion of the expenses of the improvement if he expressed his readiness to carry out the improvement instead of requiring the local authority to do so. There need be no fear that the medical officers would not put in force the powers of the measure. He was quite sure that nobody who knew the spirit of the medical profession, and particularly of that class of it who were engaged as medical officers under various sanitary boards, would concur in the fear which had been expressed on that subject; in fact, his fear was that they might probably, in their zeal, be carried farther than was desirable. Moreover, the 4th clause provided that when 20 or more persons liable to be rated to any rate under this measure, complained to the medical officer of the unhealthiness of any area within his jurisdiction, it should then be the duty of the medical officer to inspect such area, to make an official representation of the facts, and to state his opinion whether it was an unhealthy area or not. He believed that the Bill, when amended in Committee, would be found to be a most valuable one, and that it would work well, and the principal question which he hoped the Home Secretary would consider was, whether it was not fair that the measure should provide that some proportion of the expenses should be borne by the ratepayers, as they would benefit so much by the improvements made.

MR. JAMES said, he imagined that in the abstract there could be but one opinion of the question of the domiciliary condition of the poor in our large towns. It was admirably expressed by the Prime Minister in opening the Shaftesbury Park estate, that the best security for the well-being of the artizans was to be found in their dwellings. This was apparent in all our large towns, and the matter hardly came within the limits of ordinary party feeling. If the Home Secretary was able to accomplish even a small portion of what he desired to achieve, he would not only deserve, but receive the thanks of the working-classes, and those who took an interest in the health of the poor. Whether or not the Bill was productive of great or small results, the discussion of its provisions in this House would bring prominently before the public mind a fact now too frequently overlooked, that was how much the dwellings of the rich and poor were put down in localities which were so distinct. If any one went out into the metropolis, or any of our large towns, they must have observed how social distinctions of this kind were maintained; the poor were kept out of sight and so out of mind; and when one thought of the old aphorism that one half of the world hardly knew how the other half lived, one was obliged to acknowledge the large amount of truth it unfortunately contained. In this Bill there was a very great deal of good, but it proceeded partly on a wrong principle. He must confess to a feeling of surprise that a Conservative Government, which raised an outcry, not long since, about over-legislation on social questions, should have put forward this measure under rather exceptional circumstances, as hitherto it had generally been left to individual enterprize to provide accommodation in the matter of dwellings. No doubt, the difficulty of uniting philanthropy and business in these matters was a great one. He had faith in commercial principles, and could not help thinking that interferences with the laws of supply and demand might lead to results the very opposite to those which their promoters supposed. They wanted to see how far the Bill would proceed on sanitary grounds rather than in the matter of providing dwellings for artizans. Ought not the erection of houses for this purpose to proceed solely on commercial grounds. He was informed on authority, which no one could dispute, that plenty of money was to be secured for this object at 4 per cent, and he could not help thinking that building societies—which had done so large an amount of good—combined with the enforcement of the sanitary laws, would meet the exigencies of the case. He agreed with the criticism that this was legislation of a partial kind. He had spent some time in investigating the matter, and he was sorry to say he had seen homes of the poor which were absolutely unfit for human beings to live in. He had seen some in such a state that any master of foxhounds in that House would be ashamed to kennel his dogs in them. But legislation of the character proposed would defeat its own ends. In our large towns the demands of the labour market had been so great that almost every hole and corner had been ransacked to make house-room for the workmen. If, under this scheme, the houses were let for philanthropic purposes, it would raise the rates, although not perhaps in the particular locality in which the scheme was being carried out, for the question arose, how were they to assist those whom they had displaced. He was afraid that in some instances they would drive them from bad to worse. Mr. Chambers, in his Report on Edinburgh, stated that 410 families were dispossessed by certain improvements, and found dwellings elsewhere. In the Report from Glasgow, it was said that attempts were made on one occasion to trace the population thus dispossessed to their new homes, but without success. It would be a great evil if they drove them back to some poorer district, where they would be unable to obtain work and the necessaries of life. There was, besides, no doubt that many of the local burdens in large towns were so great, that the local bodies would resent any further incubus on the rates. He regretted that the House had not some clear and accurate facts which would give them an exact statement as to how far the rateable property in the 64 towns of upwards of 25,000 inhabitants, had increased, and what was the present burden of the rates. They would then be better able to understand what they were about. He remembered that last year, in introducing the Licensing Bill, the Home Secretary alluded to the necessity of the working classes having happy homes. If so, let them hope they would be surrounded by the comforts which made home happy. He was anxious to know whether the Licensing Bill of last Session had proved a boon to our working-class population; he should be glad to hear from the right hon. Gentleman what effect that measure had had on drunkenness in Liverpool? Nothing would give him greater pleasure than to hear that its results were contributing to the diminution of that great evil. He then alluded to the remarks of the Home Secretary, who, in introducing the present Bill had said, it was based on three assumptions,—first, that it was no duty of the State to provide its citizens with the necessities of life; secondly, that if you do not take care of yourself the State will take care of you, was one of those axioms that no Government should endeavour to have enforced; and thirdly, that it was our duty to do everything we could on sanitary grounds. On the latter point, they were all agreed; but with reference to the other two assumptions, he did not know whether the Home Secretary was thinking of an ideal state in which the Poor Law could not exist. To provide the poor with the necessities of life was the very object and purport of the Poor Law Board of this country, and he believed that we always would make provision for the destitute poor. If, sometimes, the administration of the Poor Law was severe, it was in order that the spirit of independence among the poor might be sustained. As to the Government encouraging local bodies to erect buildings for artizans and others who might thus be stigmatized as paupers, the Poor Law might be greatly enlarged. A good deal of action had been taken in this matter by voluntary societies, such as the Charity Organization Society, than which, he believed, few charitable bodies had done more good in the metropolis and through the country; but he was sometimes led to fear that from the manner in which gentlemen brought together at such societies expressed their views, they might do harm sometimes to the very parties to whom they were so eager to do good. The Home Secretary had laid upon the Table an account of what had been done in some of our large towns, and in some, it appeared there had been a very large increase of public expense. In Glasgow it amounted to £300,000, and in Edinburgh to £265,000. That was a large expenditure indeed, and rather ominous to public bodies. He hoped that from the few criticisms he had passed in reference to this Bill, it might not be thought he was indifferent to the great question of welfare and the homes of the poor. He knew enough of the condition of such homes, and how much of happiness or misery must depend on such conditions, but he was also aware that the greatest happiness lay in the feeling of independence which the occupier of a home possessed. He did not think this Bill was likely to do a great deal of good. He could not help thinking that local bodies would suspect the central authority of a desire to assume the duties of local administration. The tendency of this debate had been to find fault with the local bodies in the discharge of other duties, and no doubt they were often slow and tardy in their operations; but they would find in such bodies the surest representatives of sanitary principles, who would be opposed to putting the Bill into operation on economical grounds, on which, not only the wealth of the country, but the independence of its citizens must depend.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, that notwithstanding the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld), he utterly denied that the existence of the Poor Law was any argument in favour of the Socialistic doctrine, that the State was bound to provide anything for the necessities of the poor. The establishment of the Poor Law was in itself but an after attempt to do justice for a great wrong. Formerly one-fifth of the revenues of the landed property of the Kingdom was devoted to the poor, and it was not until they had been robbed of that, that they got the small pittance accorded to them by the Poor Law. The law of supply and demand did not apply to the present case, inasmuch as the hon. and learned Member for Barnstaple (Mr. Waddy) had shown that in every case where overcrowded portions of cities had been cleared away, the rents of the houses subsequently erected had been raised; and if that were a true argument it was fatal to the Bill. Beyond that the experience of the Peabody Trustees showed that even when persons had large sums of money to spend they could not, in the absence of some legal provision, secure sites on which to erect buildings for the working classes. That pointed to this necessity—that they must somehow or another seek for a site where the ground was not so expensive. Now, under the Bill, powers of compulsory purchase only extended to the area which was found unhealthy and overcrowded; and as the Home Secretary did not contemplate that the families who were dispossessed should go into the adjoining neighbourhood, which then would become overcrowded in like manner, the result would be that large barrack-like houses must rise, tier upon tier, on the site which was cleared. Such lofty buildings, however—as pointed out in the Report of the Poor Law Commissioners on the sanitary condition of the labouring classes in 1842, and in the Report on the Health of Towns in 1846—stopped the free circulation of air in a town. Insufficient air entered into these dwellings, and they also acted as screens to other parts of a town. Thus they were not only unhealthy in themselves, but were the cause of ill-health to others, whilst the sewer which served them had to carry off such an accumulation of excreta, that unless it was very well constructed it would be the means of propagating disease, and when a fever once found its way into such a stack of houses it was most difficult to get rid of it. The necessity for these barracks could only be avoided by empowering local authorities to take sites compulsorily outside a town. There was no such power, however, in the Bill. No doubt a Cabinet composed of landed gentry might find some difficulty in making up their minds to interfere with the rights of landlords; but those rights had already been interfered with by the railway companies, and certainly there was a stronger case to be made in favour of the health of the people than of the railway companies. If powers of compulsory purchase were extended in this way to the country, rents would be lowered, dwellings would be more healthy, towns would be less crowded, and many of the working-classes would have gardens and the sight of green fields. In London hundreds and thousands of workmen came into town from their homes in the country, and they would do the same in the large provincial towns if they had the opportunity, especially if the same franchise existed outside the municipality as inside it. He hoped that a grievous want in a very good Bill would be supplied by the extension of the compulsory powers in the way he had suggested. Again, the Preamble of the Bill did not correspond with the clauses. The Preamble spoke generally of overcrowding in towns; and the clauses limited the Bill to towns containing over 25,000 inhabitants. Now, he could not see any reason why the Home Secretary had not extended the provisions of the Bill with regard to overcrowding and unhealthiness of dwellings to all towns of 5,000 inhabitants and upwards, for there were quite as many of the smaller towns which required as much attention as the larger. He knew of small towns where the higher classes occupied the best sites for their houses, while the humbler people had to live in the lower parts of the town, in houses so close together and in such unhealthy conditions that they ought properly to be called holes and dens. He suspected that a Committee of the Cabinet had been at work upon the Bill, and he knew from experience what happened then. One Member of the Government took immense pains to get up a subject; and then his measure was referred to men who knew nothing about it. In this case the Preamble had been left in by the Committee, while the operation of the Bill itself had been restricted. He thought this a very serious defect in the measure, for it often happened that overcrowding, filth, and disease were as rife in small as in large towns. The Home Secretary contemplated getting rid of the bad parts of a town under the provisions of this Bill; but he made no regulations to insure that the buildings to be erected on the sites of those destroyed should be healthy, decent, or comfortable, and, therefore, the new buildings might be worse than the old ones. Neither was there anything in the Bill to insure the new houses being put to a proper use or to prevent overcrowding. A valuable Paper which had been laid before the House showed that rooms in some of the new buildings in Edinburgh and Glasgow were occupied at night by market gardeners who rose at 3 o'clock in the morning, and in the day-time by actors who were up all night—it was a regular case of Box and Cox over again. Could anything be more deteriorating to the air of the rooms than such a practice? and yet there was nothing in the Bill that would prevent it being followed in the new buildings which were to be erected under its provisions. The Medical Officers of Health of Edinburgh had reported that unfortunately the new houses erected in that city had been constructed more with the view to secure a handsome elevation than healthy arrangements, and that the consequence was that dirt and other evils reigned supreme. He hoped that the facts stated in this Report would be a warning to the right hon. Gentleman to take the necessary steps to prevent similar abuses resulting from the operation of this Bill. It was true that considerable power was to be given to the town councils by this measure; but he would remind the right hon. Gentleman that the worst houses in England belonged to town councils, who were the most hard-hearted persons in the world towards the poor. How dare the sanitary officer send in a report adverse to the wishes of his town council? Even if he did, what was there in the Bill to prevent them from disregarding it? He should doubtless be told that the Bill gave any 20 of the ratepayers power to move in the matter; but it was almost impossible to get that number of persons to combine for such a purpose. Even assuming that the town councils were willing to act, it would be very difficult for them to do so, seeing that that enlightened body the Metropolitan Board of Works, notwithstanding their ample powers, had been unable to clear a single spot in the metropolis on which to erect dwellings for the poor. On the whole, however, he thought the measure a good one, and he should be very sorry if, when properly amended, it did not become law. He trusted the

Lord Robert Montagu

Home Secretary would meet all his objections himself and personally prepare the Amendments, and in conclusion he thanked the right hon. Gentleman for bringing in the Bill.

MR. ANDERSON said, he simply rose to express a strong hope that the Home Secretary, in his reply, would tell them distinctly what he proposed to do as regarded Scotland. There was a very strong desire indeed that the provisions should be extended to Scotland, and the Lord Provost of Glasgow had come up to London that day, expressly with a view to urge this point on the right hon. Gentleman. It might be thought that because Glasgow had an Act of its own, they did not want anything more. That Act was certainly a very large one, involving an expenditure of something near £2,000,000; but still it must be remembered that it embraced only a small part of the City of Glasgow, and that they wanted something which would enable them to attack other parts of the city which were not reached by that Act. He could assure the right hon. Gentleman that the feeling in favour of the Bill being extended to Scotland was very strong, and he hoped that he, together with the Lord Advocate, would make arrangements for causing its provisions to be applicable to that country.

MR. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH congratulated the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary on the manner in which his Bill had been received by the House. The criticisms had been entirely directed to its details, and the principal outlines of the Bill seemed to meet with general approval. The right hon. Gentleman might therefore look forward to passing the measure without serious difficulty; but he would be wise if he were ready to assent to its being materially amended in Committee. His right hon. Friend had shown so much earnestness on the subject, not only in this, but in the last Session of Parliament, that he had every confidence that he would be ready to consider Amendments in the spirit in which they were offered; and that it would be his own aim to make the Bill as good and as complete as possible. The first earnest he had given of his interest in the subject was during the progress of the Midland Railway Bill last Session, which would have removed a large number of poor people, without providing for them any new accommodation.

By the firm course his right hon. Friend had adopted, he had happily averted that evil; and not only so, but by the new Standing Orders which he had carried in the House of Commons, he had rendered it impossible for railway companies, or any other bodies, obtaining Private Acts of Parliament in future, to disturb large numbers of working people without making suitable provision for them. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Horsham (Sir Seymour Fitzgerald) seemed to imagine that this Bill was intended to deal with these cases of railway improvements; he seemed to be unaware of the manner in which those cases had been dealt with by the new Standing Orders; so that this Bill had nothing to do with that subject. In his speech in introducing the Bill, the Home Secretary showed some anxiety that local authorities should not be enabled under this measure to make great street improvements, as he said, for their own glorification. Now, he (Mr. Kay-Shuttleworth) did not share this anxiety. In the case of Glasgow, the Corporation obtained powers by their Improvement Act over a very large area; and it was owing to the large scale on which their operations had been effected that the benefits to all classes in the town had been so great. But he spoke with a knowledge of the opinions of those who had been foremost in the work in Glasgow, when he stated that they much regretted that they had not obtained powers over a yet larger area, as the benefits derived seemed to be directly proportionate to the scale on which the improvements were made. He quite concurred with his right hon. Friend that the main object to be kept in view was sanitary improvement; and, therefore, he thought it was wise to propose that the Medical Officer of Health should be the first person to put the measure in operation; but if the sanitary result would be greater, he saw no objection to street improvements and to the "glorification" which the Metropolitan Board of Works or the town councils might thus obtain. The House had listened with pleasure to the earlier part of the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Barnstaple (Mr. Waddy), who had brought forward a number of statements which seemed likely to lead up to a conclusion highly consistent with the laws of political economy; but suddenly, and as it were in a corner of his speech, he had announced as his conclusion that public money should be given for the charitable purpose of cheapening house rents, and that this plan would not result in the pauperizing of the people. He (Mr. Kay-Shuttleworth) did not think that he need waste words in combating such a doctrine. But the statements in the part of the hon. Member's speech to which he had first referred seemed to be founded on some fallacies. He had expressed an apprehension that by this Bill, his right hon. Friend would benefit one class only, and that the wrong class. That view had been partly answered by his hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool (Mr. Rathbone), who showed that large numbers of the artizan class did live in those miserable dwellings which it was the object of the Bill to remove; and those artizans would be glad to move into the better houses which will be provided in their place. Even amongst thieves and others of the most debased classes of the community—to their great misfortune and injury—considerable numbers of the industrious classes were to be found; and they would undoubtedly be benefited by the operation of this Bill. As his right hon. Friend had said the other night, his object should not be to provide new rookeries. In the place of the rookeries good dwellings should be provided, and the working classes would be ready to pay increased rents for them. What had happened with respect to the worst classes in Glasgow? In that city many of the wynds and closes where the lowest classes dwelt had been demolished. Their former inhabitants had not of course gone to live in the excellent dwellings provided by the corporation in the suburbs, but every class had got a step up. The people who went to the new buildings vacated their former dwellings, and these were inhabited by those who had lived in the demolished wynds and closes. In an admirable paper in Macmillan's Magazine last June, Miss Octavia Hill, who had lately visited Glasgow, and had judged the work done under the Improvement Act by the light of her great experience in London, gave the following account of what had happened in Glasgow. She said—

rendered necessary, had for the most part been built, not on the old sites, but in the suburbs, upon land bought for that purpose by the trustees of the Act, and by them leased to builders who were bound to erect workmen's tenements. These new dwellings were of a type superior to those previously inhabited by artizans in the city, and they have accordingly largely resorted there, leaving their old abodes to be occupied by those displaced from the demolished wynds and courts."

She remarked also—

"Merely to break in upon these nests of thieves cannot but be a great good; some kind of wrong is not decreased by scattering it, but dishonesty thrives most when fostered in such dens. The near presence of honest, respectable neighbours makes habitual thieving impossible; just as dirty people are shamed into cleanliness when scattered among ordinary, decent folk, and brought into the presence of the light."

The hon. Member for Maidstone (Sir Sydney Waterlow) had, as he might say, answered the hon. and learned Member for Barnstaple, before he had advanced his objection that the wrong class would be benefited, by saying that the lowest class were benefited by such legislation and benefited in the only way possible. The greatest gain to be derived from this Act would be found to be in the absolute demolition of the worst parts—the fever spots—of our towns. The provisions for rebuilding were necessary on the same principles as the Standing Orders of last year, to prevent a measure for the advantage of the whole community from injuring the working class by depriving them of habitations. He could not resist from making one more quotation from Miss Octavia Hill's paper, which might stimulate an ambition to follow the noble example of Glasgow. She said—

"As I looked over the official photographs of these wynds, dark, and dirty, and in every way degraded, and the Chairman and Secretary of the Trust, which has had the working of the Act, kept saying, 'This is still standing, but that is gone,' and 'That is taken away, and that and that comes down next month,' I could not help feeling how proud and glad these men must be to have achieved such reforms; and the longing rose strong in me that someone some day in London might be able thus to point to the sites of the old fever dens and say, 'They are gone.'"

There was, he thought, some prejudice in the mind of the hon. Member for Barnstaple against the tall model dwellings erected by various associations in London. His remarks respecting the dangers to health were answered by the diminished death-rate in those buildings, and the comparative absence of disease. The dangers had been exaggerated by the hon. Member, and the blocks which he (Mr. Kay-Shuttleworth) had seen were not generally built, in the manner described, round a square court, forming a deep central well; but the architects had now devised means for surrounding such buildings on all sides with air-spaces, and with thorough ventilation. Moreover, if lofty buildings should be objected to, it would not be necessary to build to any great height in order to house a larger number properly on a given area than were at present badly accommodated there, and even overcrowded. The most densely inhabited district of which he was aware in London was the Berwick Street sub-district of Westminster, where it was roughly calculated that there were 428 inhabitants to the acre. The Metropolitan Association had shown in their new buildings in Farringdon Road that 1,600 persons could be well accommodated on an acre of land, nearly half of which was devoted to open air-spaces and play-grounds. A report to the Marylebone vestry from their medical officer, in March last, described "a number of old dilapidated tenements," Beaumont's Buildings, near Edgware Road—

"These consist of 20 cottages, placed in four parallel rows: the two inner rows, being attached at their backs, have no thorough ventilation. . . . None of these cottages have rooms above the ground-floor. . . . From the floor to the ceiling is only seven feet; but, inasmuch as the flooring is some six inches below the level of the forecourt, the height of the eaves of the roof from the ground is but little more than six feet. These cottages are all, without exception, damp, some of them exceedingly so. The number of families occupying these cottages is 17, comprising 85 persons. . . . Rheumatism and bronchitis are very prevalent amongst the aged occupants in winter."

Could any hon. Member doubt that a larger number of people could be properly housed on this area in new buildings without their being carried to any excessive height? The hon. Member for Barnstaple had drawn a striking contrast between the rents which the poorer classes were in the habit of paying in London and those which prevailed in the improved dwellings. But there was this fallacy in his argument—that he contrasted rents paid for single rooms with those asked for tenements of two, three, or more rooms. If they were to be content with providing single-room

tenements in the new buildings, there need be little or no increase in rent. But it was only fair, in comparing rents, to divide the rent by the number of the rooms. A common rent for old one-room tenements in London was 1*s.* 6*d.* a-week, and the following were examples of the rents in improved dwellings:—The Metropolitan Association had 233 tenements, with two rooms in each; the rents varied from 4*s.* to 6*s.* 6*d.* They had 242 with three rooms in each, and rents from 4*s.* 6*d.* to 6*s.* 6*d.* The Marylebone Association had 159 single-room tenements, with rents from 1*s.* 6*d.* to 2*s.* 6*d.*; whilst the rents in the buildings erected by the trustees of Mr. Peabody were, in the case of 111 single rooms, 2*s.* to 3*s.*; in 569 tenements of two rooms, 3*s.* to 4*s.* 6*d.*; in 215 tenements of three rooms, 4*s.* to 5*s.* 6*d.* But the fact was, that many of the people who were paying 1*s.* 6*d.* for a most miserable room were well able to pay more rent; and he was assured, by persons who had large experience, that no difficulty was found in getting increased rents from them as soon as they removed into better houses. He would now offer a few suggestions upon the provisions of the Bill. He concurred with his right hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld) that the 3rd clause required to be expanded, so as to apply to the unhealthy houses and those unfit for human habitation mentioned in the Preamble. At present, the only streets and houses that could be condemned under the Bill were those whose closeness, narrowness, or bad arrangement was the cause of disease. The words in the Preamble respecting the want of light, air, ventilation, or of proper conveniences should be introduced. Further, they had to guard against the danger that the Bill would be inoperative: hence the importance of getting the Bill set in motion; and although in his opinion it was right to entrust the medical officer of health with the initiative, as he was the fittest judge of the healthiness or unhealthiness of the various parts of his district, yet some alternative machinery should be provided to start the improvement in the event of inaction on the part of the local medical officer, who did not always enjoy all the independence that could be desired. In any place where it might happen that he would not report, and that the 20

ratepayers mentioned in Clause 4 could not be found, the Bill would not work. In London it would be necessary that the Metropolitan Board of Works should appoint a permanent medical officer, who should report in what districts improvement schemes were most needed. A special inquiry, like that contemplated in the Bill, into a particular district would always convey more or less of a reflection on the district officer; but if the Metropolitan Board had a permanent medical officer, then in directing him to visit one district among others, the Board would not do anything invidious to the medical officer or the vestry of that district. To guard against the danger that the inaction of a medical officer might render the Bill inoperative in any town, power should be reserved to the Local Government Board to send down one of their own medical officers in such cases, whose report should be sent to the town council and should have the same consequences as a representation from their local officer. In another point there must have been an oversight. The Bill gave the local authorities the power of taking streets and houses for an improvement scheme; but there was no power to take waste or open spaces, such as those which have been cleared of houses unfit for human habitation, under the Act of the hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. W. M. Torrens). An illustration of what he meant was furnished by a large space of ground near Russell Square, belonging to the Foundling Hospital, where a number of dwellings had been condemned by the medical officer of the district, and taken down, and then nothing more could be done, partly because there was no sufficient approach to the ground, and partly because the Peabody Trustees, who had been in treaty for it, could not obtain it without compulsory powers. A yet larger defect in the Bill was, that the local authority would only have power to take such property as was condemned for its unhealthiness by the medical officer; the area declared by him in Clause 3 to be unhealthy, was the area throughout the Bill, in the improvement scheme and in the provisional order. There was no power at any stage to enlarge it. Whilst the medical officer should point out the unhealthy spots, power should be left to the local authority to say how much adjoining property was necessary for each improvement scheme; and there should be compulsory power of taking such property in however good a state it might be. Respecting Clause 5, he would suggest that at that stage the scheme should not too strictly prescribe what exact form an improvement should ultimately take; plans of buildings should not be stereotyped in the Provisional Order. When the local authority came to sell or let the land under Clause 7, the builders—for instance, the Peabody Trustees or the hon. Member for Maidstone's Company—might be able to suggest better plans than any originally contemplated. But before selling or letting, such plans of new buildings should be submitted by the local authority to the Home Office or the Local Government Board, lest buildings of a wrong description—for too high a class, for example—should be erected. According to Clause 5, the new dwellings must be provided within the limits of the area, or in the vicinity thereof. This limitation was quite necessary in regard to London, where much injury would be done to working people if they were driven to a distance. But the same necessity did not exist in smaller towns, indeed, it had not been recognized in Glasgow. The area of the demolition might not be a proper one on which to rebuild dwellings; it might be too low, or too near a river; or it might be in such a position that it would sell to advantage for business purposes, whilst working people might be equally well, and much more cheaply housed, at a distance of a half or a quarter of a mile; and in such a case, there should be power to provide the new dwellings on a site outside the area of demolition. He was happy to inform his right hon. Friend that he heard from Dr. Greenhill, the Secretary of the Hastings Cottage Improvement Society, that the Bill seemed likely to facilitate improvements at Hastings; but he (Mr. Kay-Shuttleworth) thought it very likely that better houses could be less expensively provided there on new sites, than on the valuable areas near the sea, which might be cleared when the old cottages were removed. In conclusion, he hoped that it would be possible greatly to simplify the Bill, for he feared that local authorities would shrink from putting its complicated machinery into operation, lest the expense of acquiring land should prove more than they could afford to pay, seeing that they could be opposed by landowners at no less than five stages—once before the local inquiry, then in Parliament, twice before the arbitrator, and then by appeal to a jury. For this appeal to the jury he could see no need. And he wished they could dispense with the opportunity afforded for opposition in Parliamentary Committees; but, at least, the question raised by his hon. Friend the Member for Reading (Mr. Shaw-Lefevre) as to the apportionment of costs, might receive consideration. The statement of his hon. and gallant Friend the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works (Sir James Hogg), that his Board would work the new Act of Parliament in a loyal spirit was most encouraging, and his suggestion that a permanent arbitrator should be appointed for the Metropolis was well worthy of attention. He (Mr. Kay-Shuttleworth) should think it his duty to give Notice of certain Amendments for Committee; and if the Bill were simplified and made more elastic, he confidently hoped that it would produce great and permanent good.

MR. DALRYMPLE said, he should never wish to multiply the occasions upon which it was necessary that Scotch Members should as such address the House; but if, by possibility, it could be of service that any one representing a Scotch constituency on that side of the House should join in the appeal to the Home Secretary to extend that Bill to Scotland, he, at all events, desired to secure that Scotland should have the benefit of the provisions of the Bill. The hon. Members for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) and Greenock (Mr. Grieve), speaking from the other side, had spoken for populations of enormous importance, and his hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow (Mr. Whitelaw), on that side of the House, who perhaps more than any other man in that House was entitled to speak on behalf of large centres of labour and of the city with which he was connected, in seconding the Address in answer to the Speech from the Throne, referred to the subject, and he (Mr. Whitelaw) might very well join in the appeal now made. He could assure the Home Secretary that, so far as hon. Members on that side of the House were concerned, they would be very glad to help him in adapting the clauses to the cities and case of Scotland. In one town, at least, of Scotland there was a higher death-rate than almost anywhere in the United Kingdom; and it would be a grievous misfortune if the present opportunity was lost of doing something in regard to that important subject of the dwellings of the poor. Let Scotland profit by the measure. It was matter of regret that on many occasions there should be separate legislation for the two countries. He particularly disliked the notion, and as far as possible it ought to be avoided. Sometimes it was unavoidable; but nothing could be more obvious to any one who had had the honour of a seat in that House for a few years than that it abhorred Scotch legislation. It was therefore most important that separate legislation should be avoided on all practical occasions. He knew perfectly well what would happen on another occasion, if that Bill passed without its provisions being extended to Scotland. The subject would not be considered with that careful attention which it was likely to receive at present. He agreed with his hon. Friend who had just sat down (Mr. Kay-Shuttleworth), who, replying to the somewhat wild statements made earlier in the evening by the hon. Member for Barnstaple, had said that there was no fear that artisans would not be able to pay rent for better houses. The desire of Parliament was, that the dwellings of the wage-earning classes should be improved, and there was nothing truer than to say that much might be done to induce them to live in better houses. He could not agree with his hon. Friend in his disapproval of the title of the Bill, for he liked the title of it, inasmuch as it was short and simple, and, as a matter of fact, it described the principle of the measure, for what the House intended was to deal with artisans' dwellings, and not with the dwellings of paupers. He believed that the Bill, if carried, would educate these people to live in better dwellings, and to set apart more of their wages towards the payment of rent. He also agreed in the recommendation that the Bill should be applied to towns with a less population than 25,000. He would, in conclusion, again express the hope that the measure might be made to apply to Scotland, and he believed that this could be done without much difficulty.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR: After the admirable speech made by the Home Secretary, on the introduction of this Bill, it is unnecessary for any of us to enforce the urgency of the object which it proposes to attain. But that very circumstance deprives him of justification for its restricted character. If the Bill be urgent in the interests of the urban populations in England, it can easily be shown that its urgency is greater for the urban populations in Scotland; for it is a fact that the sanitary measures in England during the last 20 years have sufficed to prevent any augmentation in the death-rates over the whole country, while in Scotland the causes of deterioration have been greater than the means of improvement. In Scotland, the urban death-rates in the chief towns were 26·9 from 1855 to 1859, but they were 28·2 from 1861 to 1870. In the large towns they were 23·9 in the first period, and 24·6 in the second. Hence, it is not justifiable to deprive that section of the kingdom, which is in a deteriorating condition, of those powers of improvement that are to be bestowed upon another section requiring them in a less degree. If the Bill be urgent for England, it is surely more urgent for Scotland. The Home Secretary cannot reply that the Scotch towns possess local Acts which render it unnecessary. Glasgow, Edinburgh, and Dundee truly have local Acts, but Aberdeen, Paisley, Greenock, and other insalubrious towns do not possess them, and would, no doubt, be glad to have improving powers. Besides, in such towns as Glasgow, which have effected large improvements, there still are districts quite as bad as those which have been rooted out, but they are not scheduled in their local Acts. The towns would continue to act on general powers, especially if they could obtain money from the Loan Commissioners at 3½ per cent under this Bill. I trust, then, that the Home Secretary will consult the Lord Advocate how the Bill may be extended to Scotland. The Irish Members will express their own views in regard to Ireland; but as it is obviously a doubtful principle of policy to deal with large subjects of Imperial interest connected with the health of the people in a fragmentary way, I hope they will join with us in trying to get this measure extended to the whole of the United Kingdom. I now turn to the provisions of the Bill. Its first principle is a sound one—that it should only be brought into operation as a measure of public health, and not as a means of ordinary civic improvement. It is a machine which can only be set in motion to improve the health of urban populations. But what is the power which is to set the machine into activity? That we find in the 4th clause of the Bill. The Reports of the medical officers form the motive power. In all Bills which now come before the House, it is possible to see survivals of other editions of the Bill as they passed through the Cabinet. The 4th clause gives to the general reports of the medical officer nearly as wide an action as the Preamble of the Bill, for it allows him to pronounce an area as generally unhealthy; but when he begins to put the machine into motion by the 3rd clause, it becomes singularly restricted in its action, and the “want of air, light, ventilation, and proper conveniences” of the Preamble have become restricted to “the closeness, narrowness, and bad arrangement of houses.” That is a matter which we may deal with in Committee. It is essential now to inquire whether the primary medical motive power of the Bill is likely to be effective? As representing a large medical constituency, I ask permission to say a few words on this head. Medical men are animated by a strong sense of professional feeling, and will, no doubt, be anxious to co-operate with the authorities in the promotion of sanitary reforms. But suppose that there is no co-operation or desire of the authorities to put the Bill into operation—that is not only conceivable, but highly probable. Take such a case as we have recently seen in Over Darwen. There the ratepayers purposely returned a local board pledged to inaction. Under such circumstances, the medical officer would be absolutely powerless. He is the servant of the local authority, and he would know that his representations would be unwelcome and fruitless. What has forced Over Darwen into action? Partly its scourge of fever, but much more the publicity which was given to its scandalous neglect of sanitary arrangements. Unless you give to the reports of the local medical officer some support by publicity and further inquiry, where the local authority is supine, the Bill will go to sleep in a large proportion of the provincial towns. I do not suggest that either the Home Secretary or the President of the Local Government Board should force the authorities into action; but I think they should inquire into cases of negligence, and bring public opinion to bear upon it. With this view, it would be well that when no action takes place after the report of the medical officer has been made, a copy of his report should be sent to the confirming authority. Then, in a case of urgency, special medical inquiries might be made in the metropolis by the medical inspectors provided under Clauses 6 and 9, or in the provinces by the medical inspectors under the Local Government Board. If the medical officers knew that their representations were brought under the attention of the central sanitary authority, and that in case of urgency they might receive support through an independent inquiry, I believe that their professional zeal and their proved desire to labour for the health of the community, in spite of much discouragement from the indifference or hostility of local authorities, will ultimately suffice to ameliorate the wretched dwellings in their districts. I think the Home Secretary is wise in not attempting to force his measure in advance of public opinion in a locality; but unless he is content to see it go to sleep in most of the large towns which should come under its operation, he must by some such means as I have indicated, help the medical officer to awaken public opinion in his locality. The evils which we are now trying to remedy are not new, nor are they now brought to light for the first time. Queen Elizabeth did her best, when the density of the population was only one-fifth of what it is now, to legislate for them, and in a fashion more arbitrary than the Home Secretary does now, for, as she said, she did not like to see “poor people heaped together, and in a sort smothered.” The present Bill teaches us nothing new, but it enables public opinion, when it is formed, to act under its provisions. We know, however, that public opinion forms slowly when rates are demanded for an object which is somewhat remote, and the ultimate advantages of which to the ratepayers, are only apparent to an enlightened intelligence. A medical officer could only get over the vis inertia of this new machine by the central medical authorities giving him the support of independent inquiries when his own representations prove unavailing. Such confirmations of well-considered sanitary inquiries would throw a heavy responsibility on the local authorities, and would create a public opinion which would enforce action. I propose to place an Amendment on the Paper in the sense which I have indicated. The hon. and learned Member for Barnstaple (Mr. Waddy) has indulged in sentiments which are very nearly Communistic, for he asks us to extend money help to the poor people who are dispossessed from the rookeries. He talks of them as most virtuous inhabitants, who ought to be aided from Imperial funds. Generally, they are not working men at all, but are thieves, prostitutes, and out-door paupers. It would be a strange distribution of public money to aid these classes. Their dispersion is one of the greatest advantages of such a measure. A muddy stream in a great volume is dangerous—when it is dispersed into trickling rivulets it ceases to be so; and so the rooting out of these rookeries has been the cause of much moral improvement. A good deal has already been said as to the non-heroic provisions of the Bill. It is not a strong measure; but I agree with the Home Secretary that it is judicious not to attempt too much interference with localities in the discharge of a duty which local government ought to be able to perform. I should like to make one protest against the confusion which we are asked to introduce into sanitary legislation. In this Bill there are two confirming authorities—the Home Office and the Local Government Board—two Ministers of the Crown, both discharging the same functions of confirmation of inquiry, one for the metropolis, the other for the provinces. There is already a staff of highly-trained medical Inspectors under the Local Government Board. Is another staff to be created in the Home Office? This piecemeal and disjointed legislation in matters relating to public health, following as it does the efforts of the late Government to bring its administration under one office, and preceding, as it does, by only a few days, a Bill for consolidating the sanitary Acts, perplexes the promoters of sanitary reforms, and weakens the agencies of administration. Of course, I know that the difficulties of an uniform legislation arise from the divided state of local government in London, but that is only an argument for putting an end to this state of perplexity. I have only to say that, before concluding, I desire to strengthen the argument of the Home Secretary on a point to which he only made a slight allusion; for though at that stage of the Bill he received general support, when he came to the property clauses and the power of rating, it was by no means certain that they would be accepted without opposition. The point to which I allude is the great burden produced upon a community by cases of preventable sickness, as well as those of preventable deaths, for each of these deaths represents 30 cases of preventable sickness, lasting, on an average, 18 days. For deaths merely represent the wrecks that strew the shore, but do not show the suffering produced upon the survivors by the storms of sickness to which they are exposed. Take the case of Liverpool, upon which I reported to the House of Commons nearly 30 years ago, and which, notwithstanding much noble local effort, remains in a terrible condition of unhealthiness up to the present moment. If Liverpool were only as healthy as London, it would be annually spared 207,000 cases of sickness among its survivors. If these lose only 2s. a-day during their duration, the people of Liverpool suffer from their preventable and wholly unnecessary sickness an annual loss of £370,000. I put it in this way to show that for the living inhabitants who form the rate-payers, and upon whom the cost of improvement falls, the burden upon them of action is as nothing compared with the burden of inaction, because money spent in sanitary improvement is not merely invested for posterity, but is productive taxation even to themselves, for it is capital bearing abundant interest. The Home Secretary, in his opening speech, acted wisely in drawing a picture of the condition of the dwellings of the poorer class in our large towns, even though he had to enlarge on the most elementary principle of hygiene, that the condition of the houses determines the condition of the people. That principle has recently received important illustration by large experiences. One of these is very marked, in the case of our Army, which since the Crimean War has lessened its mortality by one-half, chiefly owing to the improvements in the drainage and ventilation of barracks. Another important experience lately acquired is, that improvements in dwellings do not merely lessen the epidemics in a population, but also that they act largely in diminishing the scourge of this country—consumption, which in various towns, after improvements of this kind, has fallen more than 40 per cent. There is, then, ample encouragement for the House to support this Bill, and to try to render it as effective as is consistent with its modest and moderate pretensions.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he had no cause to complain of the manner in which the Bill had been received by the House. The very fact that they had been now sitting for so many hours discussing what, after all, were in a great measure matters of detail, amounted to the concession that the principle of the Bill had been accepted on both sides. He would say nothing at present about the question which had been dealt with earlier in the evening—namely, the philanthropic view of the case. He was quite sure that view did not meet with acceptance in the House, either on a former night or then. The object of the Bill had been very fairly described by the hon. Member for Hastings (Mr. Kay-Shuttleworth) who had paid so much attention to the subject—it was the demolition of the great fever and plague spots in London and the large towns. All the rest followed as a matter of course. Some remarks had been made by his right hon. Friend behind him (Sir Seymour Fitzgerald) as to the way in which the houses were to be built. But his right hon. Friend could hardly have been in the House last Session, when a Standing Order was passed, requiring that suitable provision should be made for those of the working classes who might be displaced by these improvements. The Bill would enable the local authorities to get rid of those pestilential spots; and when that was done, it would carry out the provisions of the measure of last year. He was not going into all the details which had been discussed. There was no intention on the part of the Government to fix the Committee for an early day; but he must ask hon. Members who wished to place Amendments on the Paper to think well over them beforehand, because it seemed to him that if the clauses of the Bill had been carefully read, many of the remarks which had been heard in the course of the discussion would never have been made. Many of the objections which had been raised would be found, on reference to the words of the measure, to have been already met. Of course there were others which might require discussion. The burden of a great deal that had been said was, first—"You do not go far enough," and next—"You go much too far." He hoped hon. Members would bear in mind the object of the Bill as it was expressed in the title—namely, to improve the dwellings of the working classes in large towns. He did not say that in towns other than those to which the Bill referred there was not an equal call for a remedy of some kind or other, but he did say—and the difference of opinion which had been manifested in regard even to a large town like Liverpool confirmed the conviction—that the same remedy could not be applied to large towns as to small. The machinery required in the two cases would be altogether different. Therefore, he would say, do not hastily put down Amendments—although no doubt with the very best intentions—to extend the provisions of the Bill to places to which they were not at all applicable. A good deal had been said as to the manner in which it was proposed the machinery of the Bill should be set in motion. He had never put forward this measure as one the object of which was civic improvement. What he had had in view was the improvement of health, and starting with that principle, he had thought it right to introduce at the outset the medical officers. When he first came to consider the question, many of the observations which had been made in the course of the discussion were pressed forcibly upon his attention, and it did occur to him that there might, at all events, be a great inducement to the medical officers in many parts of the country to avoid taking the initiative, if they possibly could consistently with their duty. But he had had placed in his hands the printed reports of the medical officers of every district in London, and of almost all the large towns in the country, and he was bound to say that they had not shrunk from their duty. In all those reports they stated facts which he was quite sure they would abide by, and which would justify the application of the present measure. Indeed, he did not think their professional standing would ever allow them to act otherwise than they had done. In connection with the subject of local taxation there was a great principle to be maintained. He was well aware that a large portion of the House would willingly entrust to Government much larger powers than he had asked for. But he thought it would be a great mistake. So far as was possible they must depend upon local action. But he quite agreed with the right hon. Member who had just sat down (Mr. Lyon Playfair), as to the desirability of stimulating local action by means of public opinion. If the medical officer made a report, and the local authority took no action upon it, he thought it ought to be forwarded to the Secretary of State, not with the object of having the measure put in force against the wish of the local authority, or of interfering in any way with the local jurisdiction, but simply for the purpose of bringing public opinion to bear strongly upon the matter. But he was inclined to believe that the town councils would be as little disposed as the medical officers to refuse to do their duty. Why should it be thought that the town councils of the large towns of England would refuse to do that which had been readily done by their neighbours in Scotland? Why should it be supposed that those local bodies would not in England act in the same patriotic way as Glasgow and Edinburgh? But if it should happen that any town council was governed in its action by the views of a narrow-minded class of ratepayers, it would be quite right that the public opinion of the country should be directed to that particular town council, in order that it might be forced to take action, not by means of any interference on the part of the central authority, but simply by the expression of public feeling. A great many remarks had been made on matters of detail connected with the provisions of the Bill. It had been said that the 3rd clause did not carry out to the full the intentions expressed in the Preamble. All he could say was, that it had been intended to do so, and that if it did not, he would take care that it did. With regard to the area to be dealt with in any particular case, it had been said that the Bill left it to be fixed by the medical officer, who, it had been remarked, although the proper person to point out that a district was unhealthy, was not the best authority to decide how many houses should be removed. It had never been meant that that should be decided by him. The local authority, no doubt, was the body which ought to say what the particular area was for which the improvement scheme should be drawn up, for it might often be desirable to interfere with property outside the unhealthy district in order, for example, to open up a street. The hon. Member for Hastings would, no doubt, pardon him if he said that, although he had very great respect for everything that fell from him on the subject of dwelling-houses for the working classes, yet, when they came to questions as to the law clauses of the Bill, he felt bound to pay more attention to the opinions of other hon. Members who probably had a greater acquaintance with the matter. In regard to the Schedule on which the hon. Member for Hastings had made a few observations, he wished to say that it had been taken almost verbatim from what was known as the Irish Land Clauses Act. He had had special inquiries made in Ireland as to the working of that Act, and he had received the strongest expressions of opinion, to the effect that it had worked to the satisfaction of all who had come under its operation. As to the main provisions of the Bill, he did not think any fault had been found that night, except by the noble Lord the Member for Westmeath (Lord Robert Montagu), who had said that he entirely approved the Bill, with the exception that in its 20 clauses he found five mistakes, and so saying had dismissed him with his blessing. There was much force in what the hon. Member for Reading (Mr. Shaw-Lefevre) had said, as to the desirability of reducing the expenditure connected with proceedings in that House in carrying out the objects of the Bill. The House could not allow the property of persons to be taken from them against their will without Parliamentary sanction, and, no doubt, the ordinary course of procedure would have to be followed, in so far as it was necessary to respect that principle. At the same time, he could agree with the hon. Member for Reading, in thinking that special precautions might be taken to prevent vexatious proceedings before Parliamentary Committees. If there was not already power given in the Bill to the local authorities to extend the area proposed by the medical officer, he was quite prepared in that respect also to agree to an Amendment. There was another matter to which he wished to refer. Perhaps the greatest tribute which had been paid to the measure in the course of the discussion was, that an earnest wish had been expressed for its extension to Scotland. He had purposely left out Scotland, because he had thought the cities of Glasgow and Edinburgh had enough to do with their own Improvement Bills to keep them going for some time. But he had had the pleasure of seeing the Lord Provost of Glasgow that day, and by him, as well as by many Scotch Members on both sides of the House, he had been strongly pressed to extend the Bill to Scotland. The only pledge he could give was, that he would consult the Lord Advocate upon the matter, and if he found it practicable to extend the Bill to Scotland, he would not have the slightest objection to that course. With these observations, he had to thank the House again for the manner in which the measure had been received. While he remained in the office which he had now the honour to hold, nothing would give him greater pleasure than to attend to the administration of the measure so far as London was concerned, and to see that it was put in force in the best possible way. But he must again implore the House not to seek, with however good an intention, to extend it to places and to classes of property to which it had not been intended to apply. He hoped the House would pass the Bill as it stood, and thus extend an invaluable boon to masses of people in the large towns throughout the country, who had hitherto undergone so much suffering and misery and degradation in consequence of the wretched character of their dwellings, and who had been condemned to see their children die like flies before them.

TICHBORNE TRIAL.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

MR. WHALLEY, in moving for an—

Mr. Assheton Cross

“Address for Return of Thirty Petitions signed by 13,666 persons, presented to Her Majesty the Queen in relation to the late Tichborne Trial, and especially a Petition from the inhabitants of Wapping signed by 6,333 persons, and from the Tichborne neighbourhood signed by 853 persons, all which Petitions were forwarded by command of Her Majesty to the Secretary of State for the Home Department for advice thereon; and, Copy of the Correspondence in relation thereto,”

said, the reply to the Motion which had been already conveyed to him was, that it was not according to precedent, and he therefore asked the special attention of the House to what the Motion was, so that, even if it should be the first of the kind, it was high time that a precedent should be established. It was for a Return to that House of certain Petitions which, having been presented to Her Majesty, praying for the exercise of her Prerogative of mercy, had been by Her Majesty referred to the Secretary of State for the Home Department for his advice thereupon. Now, if the Secretary of State was prepared to state, as a matter of principle, that he was not amenable to the House for advice given to Her Majesty, it was well that they should consider such a principle. The ordinary duty of every Minister of State was to give such explanation to that House, and the very term responsible Government, of which, by the Constitution, they were supposed to be the type, could have no meaning, unless the Ministers were then prepared to answer for the advice given by them, in their several Departments, to the Crown; and he would not urge this argument further until the right hon. Gentleman should have declared in his place that he would not afford the House the opportunity of knowing what these Petitions were, and how they had been dealt with. The case was, however, sufficient in itself to justify a proceeding in favour of publicity. It was the Tichborne Case as to which that House was specially responsible to the public, as having sanctioned an unprecedented outlay of public money for the prosecution. Last Session Petitions, signed by above 50,000 persons, were presented, asking for further inquiry, as well as to the trial itself as in respect of certain extraordinary powers assumed by the Court of Queen's Bench to fine and imprison for contempt of Court; and the reason for these Petitioners having addressed Her Majesty in person, was some difficulty in expressing their sentiments in accordance with the Rules of the House, or the view taken thereof by the right hon. Gentleman in the Chair. The fact was, the Petitions in question raised the House to such a degree of irritation by speaking of the "unfair trial," and using other expressions which implied a want of faith in the justice of the trial, that at length the Speaker refused to receive those containing such remarks. The proceedings which took place in the House excited an additional sensation in the country, and the inhabitants of Wapping, which was one of the "scenes" in the extraordinary case, eventually determined upon addressing Her Majesty on the subject, which was an unusual course, perhaps. This Petition he had referred to in his Motion. He did not wish to go into any disputable question of that kind; but it might not perhaps be known to the House that these Petitioners and others were by no means content, and that during the Recess, meetings had been held in very many large towns and populous districts, at which very strong language had been used, and he might say unanimously adopted, in their demand for further inquiry into this trial, and its manifold incidents. In fact, the feeling was widely spread, and was constantly increasing, that the conspiracy for which the victim was now lingering to death in Dartmoor, after his being deprived of his estates by a special Act of Parliament, was one that imperatively demanded exposure and punishment, and that it concerned the confidence of the public in the fair administration of justice that further investigation should take place. He had himself taken no part in these public meetings, and was therefore the more free to speak of them as entitled to the attention of that House, as expressed in the Petition to that House, and referred to Her Majesty the Queen, and he therefore appealed to the right hon. Gentleman not hastily to refuse to afford the House in this form all reasonable information as to the nature and extent of the public feeling on the subject. He would only add, in conclusion, that he never could speak on this subject without avowing distinctly and positively that he was as convinced as he was of his own existence, that the man now a convict in Dartmoor under the name of Castro was truly Sir Roger Tichborne. He should not be doing himself justice if he did not now state, as he had done before, that he had just as much certainty in the innocence of the man. [Laughter.] He regretted to hear anyone laugh at an honest expression of a well-founded opinion. The object of the Petitions was to express want of faith in the fairness of the trial, and a belief that further investigation, at all events, was necessary in order to restore the confidence of the public in the administration of justice in the country. That was the subject of the Petitions, and it was one well worthy of discussion in the House; and it was on that ground that he ventured to hope that the right hon. Gentleman might be induced to withdraw his objection to the Return, or that he might be able to give some explanation of a more satisfactory nature than he (Mr. Whalley) had yet received. He trusted some hon. Member, even if he differed from him on every point touching the subject, would second the Motion, so that the right hon. Gentleman might have an opportunity of replying.

OF GEORGE BREWSTER.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, he wished to call the attention of Her Majesty's Government to an inquest held at Cambridge on the body of George Brewster, a boy between 14 and 15 years of age, who lost his life in a flue up which he had been sent by a master-sweep for the purpose of sweeping it. [The noble Earl read the report of the inquest on the deceased from The Pall Mall Gazette, in which the facts were narrated, with the result that the coroner's jury returned a verdict of manslaughter against the master.] It was high time that an end should be put to such practices. The year before last there was an atrocious murder—for it was nothing else—of a child aged 10 years, who had been sent up a chimney at Gateshead—and they did not know how many other poor children might not have been sacrificed in the same way even since that time. In the metropolis, with its population of nearly 4,000,000, there was no such thing as a climbing boy employed in the sweeping of chimnies, and, on recent inquiry in the great city of Glasgow, which contained upwards of 500,000 inhabitants, he was informed by the Chief Constable that there, too, such a mode of chimney-sweeping was now unknown. Why, then, should it be resorted to in smaller places? It was perfectly scandalous and abominable that any case such as the one at Cambridge should occur in this country. From the evidence at the inquest it would appear that the deceased boy was suffocated. Having been only a few minutes up the flue, he was taken out in a dying condition; and, notwithstanding that every effort seemed to have been made to restore him, he died within an hour from suffocation, caused by the presence of soot in the lungs and wind-pipe. He desired to know whether Her Majesty's Government could give any further information with respect to the case, and whether they would institute an inquiry? He believed the existing law was sufficiently strong; but it could not be denied that, in a great many instances, when cases were brought before magistrates, the latter would not convict. If this were so, the action of the Government might be necessary.

EARL BEAUCHAMP was afraid he could not add anything to the information which the noble Earl already possessed in regard to the case to which he had so properly called attention. With the noble Earl, he believed the law to be sufficiently strong for the entire suppression of chimney-sweeping by means of climbing boys—there were already two Acts passed in the reign of Her Majesty for putting an end to the practice—and if the law was not sufficiently stringent for that purpose, undoubtedly it ought to be made so. He did not, however, gather from the facts stated by the noble Earl that any special inquiry was called for in this case. The law did not appear to have been in any way evaded: at the inquest a verdict of "Manslaughter" was returned, and therefore there had been no failure of justice so far, and there did not appear to be any reason for apprehending that there would be. He would ask for further information, but he did not know that any special investigation would be necessary. The matter was already under the cognizance of the magistrates, and he did not think that the interests of justice would suffer at their hands. At the same time, he thought their Lordships would agree with him that the noble Earl had done well to call attention to the matter, as no doubt his having done so would be attended with beneficial results.

House adjourned at a quarter past Five o'clock, to Thursday next, half past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—First Reading—Monastic and Conventual Institutions [69].

NAVY—RELIGIOUS CEREMONY AT LAUNCHES.—QUESTION.

MR. EDWARD REED asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether it is true that the Board of Admiralty have ordered the observance of a religious ceremony, comprising the reading of a prayer, at the launches of Her Majesty's ships; and, if so, whether, in those cases in which the launches take place in tidal rivers and harbours with strong currents, the dockyard officers and private contractors have been, or are to be, relieved from all responsibility for any accidents or disasters that may arise from the suspension during the ceremony of the important and often critical mechanical operations involved in the launching of heavy ships?

MR. HUNT: In reply to the hon. Gentleman, I have to say that a service recommended by the Archbishop of Canterbury has been ordered by the Admiralty to be used at the launching of Her Majesty's Ships. Before the issuing of such order this country was, if I am rightly informed, the only one in Europe in which no religious ceremony was used on such occasions. I believe that the introduction of this service will commend itself to the feelings of the people of this country. The reading of the service, which is a very short one, will be so timed as in no way to interfere with the launching of the ships.

MR. EDWARD REED said, the right hon. Gentleman had not answered his Question, as to whether the officers and contractors who thought differently would be relieved from responsibility?

MR. HUNT: I thought that was implied in my Answer that the service would be so timed as not to interfere with the launching of the ships. The consequence is, that the liabilities and responsibilities of those persons will not be increased.

THE ARCTIC EXPEDITION. QUESTION.

MR. EDWARD REED asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether in view of the small value for scientific purposes of isolated observations in the Arctic Regions in comparison with simultaneous observations at different places, and in view also of the interest now taken in Arctic science by foreign Governments, he will postpone for one season the departure of the proposed British Arctic Expedition, and in the interval communicate with Foreign Governments, with a view to the organisation of other expeditions to make scientific observations simultaneously with our own at fixed times?

MR. HUNT: I am not prepared to take the course suggested by the hon. Gentleman. The preparations for the Expedition are now far advanced, and I should regard his project of combination with other Powers to attain the objects in view as one beset with difficulties.

CRIMINAL LAW—CASE OF CHRISTINA VIVIAN.—QUESTION.

MR. HOPWOOD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it be the fact that Christina Vivian, aged 18, pleaded guilty at the Middlesex Sessions on the 10th instant to stealing two gold watches value £30 from the shop of a jeweller, and if he would explain to the House the special circumstances under which she was discharged by the Assistant Judge without sentence, on her own recognizance and that of a gentleman who did not wish his name to be disclosed?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, he believed it was a fact that Christina Vivian, aged 18, pleaded guilty at the Middlesex Sessions on the 10th instant to stealing two gold watches, value £30, from the shop of a jeweller. He could not answer the other part of the Question otherwise than by reading to the House an extract from a rather long letter which he had received from the presiding magistrate, and which he would be happy to show to the hon. Member if he wished to see the whole of it. The prisoner, the magistrate wrote, pleaded guilty. It was her first offence, and she was most strongly recommended to mercy by the prosecutor, whose counsel was instructed earnestly to pray the Court to forbear from passing sentence, and thus afford her an opportunity of retrieving her character. The counsel for the prosecution having assured the Court that he had ascertained that the person proposed as surety, and who was then in attendance to enter into the required recognizance, was a person of unquestionable responsibility and respectability, it did not appear to the magistrate to be in accordance with practice to examine him in open Court in such a preliminary proceeding.

THE FACTORY ACT, 1874—BLEACH WORKS AND DYE WORKS.—QUESTION.

MR. MACDONALD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If it is the intention of the Government to bring in a Bill this Session to extend the provisions of the Factory Act of last Session to the persons employed in the bleach works and dye works of the United Kingdom; or if it be the intention of the Government to appoint a Royal Commission or Commission to inquire into the condition of women and young persons employed in such works, with a view to legislation?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: It is at the present moment under the consideration of Her Majesty's Government in what way they will best make an inquiry with respect to children and young persons employed in factories and workshops other than textile manufactories, as far as regards health and education; but at present I am not able to state

PRIVILEGE—THE RECENT DEBATE—PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

OBSERVATIONS.

SIR JOHN ASTLEY: Mr. Speaker—I beg leave to make a few remarks in reference to the way in which the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) spoke of me yesterday. I do not wish to go into the question of good taste on his part—as to whether, after I had withdrawn the remarks that I had made at an agricultural show, and which I admit were pretty strong—I do not care to go into the question of whether it was good taste on the hon. Member's part to bring the matter up again. But I do feel that some of those remarks which he made may go forth to people who do not happen to know me perfectly, or that I have been in the Army and am a soldier; and they may think that I was frightened by an Irishman. I beg to say that I never have been frightened by any individual yet, and I certainly was not influenced by any such feeling in this matter. I have got the letters with me, and with the permission of the House I will read them, to show that what the hon. Member for Louth said was not quite correct. In the month of September, shortly after the agricultural show was held at which I made the remarks complained of, I received the following letter:—

“Cork Club, Sept. 11.

“Sir,—I beg to call your attention to a report which has appeared in the London papers, of a speech delivered by you at an agricultural show in North Lincolnshire. Will you have the goodness to say if the offensive expressions attributed to you were uttered on the occasion in question. If so, I must, in the name of Chevalier O'Clery, M.P. for Wexford, ask you to withdraw them.

“Your obedient servant,

“I send you the copy of the report, with the expressions referred to underlined.”

I had not anybody to consult as to what notice I should take of that letter, but there and then, on the spur of the moment, I wrote as follows:—

“Elsham Hall, Sept. 14, 1874.

“Sir,—I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 11th, and to state that I did make use of the expressions to which you refer; and, at the request of your friend the gallant Member for Wexford, I hereby withdraw them, and am, Sir,

“Your obedient servant,

“J. D. ASTLEY.”

That, Sir, is the whole correspondence on the subject. I felt that I was wrong, and I admitted it; and I certainly wish to impress upon hon. Gentlemen that it was done under no sort of threat, but spontaneously. My language on that occasion was not very classical; but I think sometimes classics are not much used, especially by hon. Gentlemen opposite, of the Irish division.

MONASTIC AND CONVENTUAL INSTITUTIONS BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. NEWDEGATE, in rising to move for leave to bring in a Bill for appointing Commissioners to inquire respecting Monastic and Conventual Institutions in Great Britain, and for other purposes connected therewith, said, that the Bill was the same Bill he had introduced in the last Session, but for the second reading of which he had failed to obtain an opportunity, owing to the crowded state of the Order Book. Since, therefore, the Bill had been in the hands of hon. Members for the greater part of the last Session, it was unnecessary that he should then enter into a detail of its provisions. He rested the measure chiefly on this circumstance—that, with the exception of the United States, this was the only principal country in the world in which there were no practical legal regulations with respect to those institutions. He felt it would be unreasonable, as the documents and translations descriptive of the laws of foreign States with respect to these institutions would soon be in the hands of hon. Members, that he should on the present occasion detain the House further than by moving for leave to introduce his Bill.

Motion agreed to.

Bill for appointing Commissioners to inquire respecting Monastic and Conventual Institutions in Great Britain, and for other purposes connected therewith, ordered to be brought in by Mr. NEWDEGATE, Sir THOMAS CHAMBERS, and Mr. HOLT.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 69.]

PUBLIC WORSHIP FACILITIES BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. SALT, in rising to move that the Bill be now read a second time, said, it was identical with the Bill which he introduced last Session, but which he was unable to proceed with on account of the time of the House being taken up with Government affairs; and further it was similar to the Bill which passed through the House in 1873, but which, owing to some misunderstanding, was lost in its passage through the House of Lords. It differed from the Bill of 1873 in some important points. He had omitted altogether the clause relating to chapels in private houses. He had omitted it in deference to the views expressed by some Members of the Upper House. Peers had peculiar, but not very well defined privileges with respect to private chaplains and chapels. It might seem somewhat strange that persons connected with the Peerage, and possessing large property, should have ecclesiastical privileges simply because they were Members of the Peerage. Other persons being only commoners, had estates and households as large or larger than those of any Peer. If they felt aggrieved, he could offer them some comfort. They had a large choice of religions. He could inform them, having paid attention to the subject for some years, that there was not a form of religion amongst the hundreds in the world which men might not practise with perfect liberty in their own homes, with the exception of the worship of the Church of England. He would now proceed to say a few words as to the difficulties for which he proposed in the present Bill to provide a remedy, and he could not better explain them than by quoting a passage from a Charge which was delivered in 1872 by one of the most eloquent of our Bishops. The Bishop of Peterborough, in speaking on that occasion of the great activity which existed throughout the Church generally, expressed a wish that he could say as much of every parish in his diocese, that there were in it no neglected parishes, no slothful or incompetent clergymen.

“There are,” he added, “parishes among us which are a disgrace to the diocese and the despair of the Bishop; clergymen who neither do their duty nor allow anyone else to do it for them; who strain to the utmost those legal rights of our parochial system which are designed to protect the clergyman in his work, and not from it; and who contrive by virtue of these to make, in spite of parishioners or Bishop, their parishes very Gideons fleeces, dry as summer dust, while all around them may be watered with the dews of reviving life.”

Such was the rebuke of one of the most eminent Prelates on the Episcopal Bench—a truly hard-working Bishop. There was a letter published some two years ago by a clergyman resident in the metropolis, in which he stated that in the parish in which he lived there were fully 100,000 inhabitants, and church accommodation for about 18,000. The Dissenting chapels would hold about 12,000 more, and after deducting the 20,000 persons who were too old or too young to attend, there were probably 50,000 persons unprovided for in church or chapel. Of these, perhaps, 25,000 would attend if suitable accommodation were provided. The writer went on to make a very good suggestion to the effect that, as there were a great many clergymen employed in the parish in schools, and as professors, lecturers, or tutors, and in various other ways, who had Sundays at their disposal, their services might be made available for additional Sunday services. But what made this simple and sensible plan impossible? It was in the power of the incumbent to suppress every meeting for public worship conducted according to the forms of the Church of England, while he had no power to interfere with the propagation of Romanism, Dissent, Infidelity, or Red Republicanism. He (Mr. Salt) would now refer to a letter from a gentleman living in a country parish. He said that the village and the larger portion of the population were two and a half miles from the parish church—so that, with the exception of two or three landowners who could avail themselves of carriage conveyance, not a soul ever attended Divine Service there. The writer went on to state that the poor of the parish especially were subjected to the caprice and indolence of an incumbent who held very extreme opinions, and if such a Bill as the present were to become law the wants of the parish would be supplied by the erection of places affording adequate accommodation for public worship. The writer added—

“I can afford abundant evidence of the good effect which Divine Service has produced here in former years, when I then fitted up a dwelling-house for the purpose, and a clergyman was permitted to do week-day duty in this parish.”

Now, that evidence, he thought, was sufficient to show that there existed some need for interference on the part of the Legislature. There was a curious state of the law as matters now stood, in accordance with which, supposing an incumbent of a parish who was a really zealous man had established a small school or public service in any part of his parish where he might think the population stood in need of special attention, that service might go on very well during his incumbency, but might be stopped in the event of his removal from the parish by his successor without any reason whatsoever being assigned, and although the parishioners might be willing to pay for an additional clergyman. He would now attempt to show how his Bill would deal with the difficulty. It was practically divided into two portions. The first clause provided that where a service had been established by an incumbent, or with his consent, it should not of necessity cease on the incumbency becoming void—that was, should not cease unless the Bishop's license said that it should. Another part of the Bill would be much more debated—that relating to the cases in which the Bishop's authority was brought to bear. A certain number of parishioners—namely, 25—who wanted a service established in a particular part of a parish might go to the Bishop and apply for the license for a minister. In this matter the interests of the incumbent were strictly guarded. As soon as the Bishop received the requisition he would have to ascertain for himself whether the additional service was absolutely necessary, and also, if it was, whether the incumbent was unwilling or unable to provide the service required. In case the incumbent was either unable or unwilling to provide such service, the Bishop would give notice of his intention to license a clergyman for the duty, and state who the clergyman was to be, after which the appointment would be made in due course. But there was a provision enabling either the Bishop, the incumbent, or the parishioners, to refer the whole matter to a Commission, consisting of the rural dean or arch-deacon as chairman, a clergyman and layman nominated by the incumbent, and another clergyman and layman nominated by the parishioners, who should inquire into the case, and upon their report the license should issue or not issue. Several objections had been made to the Bill. Amongst other things, it had been said that this Bill would be an infringement of the parochial system. Now, what was the parochial system? Such an inquiry presented unusual difficulties, not only from the complexity of Ecclesiastical Law, but from the fact that the opinions of ecclesiastical lawyers themselves were generally at total variance with each other. He had never been able in his experience to find two persons who agreed on the subject. If he went to one ecclesiastical lawyer and told him he had just consulted another, he was sure to be told that the other gentleman knew nothing about it. But with respect to the parochial system, he found in Burns's Ecclesiastical Law a remarkably clear statement—namely,

“There is no general principle of ecclesiastical law more firmly established than this—that it is not competent to any clergyman to officiate within the limits of a parish without the consent of the incumbent thereof.”

Whether that was good law he could not say; but he had no doubt that it embodied the general idea underlying the parochial system. Now, so far from being the first person to infringe this principle, which some people seemed to hold as almost sacred, he was only following in the wake of a series of Acts of Parliament which had been passed during the last 40 years. However dear the parochial system might be to clergymen themselves, there was no doubt it had proved very inconvenient to laymen, as was shown by the long-continued struggle of Parliament to limit its stringency. About the year 1824 an Act was passed for the appointment of chaplains of gaols, without reference to the incumbent, and simply by the license of a Bishop. In 1830 Parliament passed the Church Building Act, which also set aside the incumbent, merely allowing him power to make a statement of his objections. In 1834 an Act was passed for the appointment of chaplains of unions, again without reference to the incumbent. In 1863 an Act was passed with regard to services in Wales which was specially framed to prevent interference on the incumbent's part. Again, in 1868, an Army Bill was passed, which disposed of the incumbent by the ingenious device of marking off a space which was to be regarded as extra-parochial, and within which services could be held. An anecdote had once been related to him that a Volunteer officer, who had assembled his men for a Sunday service, to be performed by their own chaplain, was interrupted by the rector of the parish. The officer, without staying to argue, simply marched his regiment into the next parish, where the neighbouring incumbent was more complaisant. The Public Schools Act, passed the same year—1868—withdraw public school chapels from the jurisdiction of incumbents; and in 1869 the Endowed Schools Act was passed with similar provisions. Then, in 1871, the Private Chapels Act removed from the jurisdiction of incumbents chapels belonging to all public and charitable institutions. But the Act to which he desired to call particular attention, and which he thought must have been overlooked by those persons who accused him of infringing the parochial system, was the Private Patronage Act, 14 & 15 Vict. c. 97. This Act empowered the Ecclesiastical Commissioners to establish a church with only the consent of the Diocesan, and without reference to the incumbent at all. In effect, that Act absolutely overrode the incumbent altogether. But it was necessary under that Act that persons seeking additional church accommodation should—

“Provide (a) a permanent church to be approved by the Board, (b) an endowment of £100 at least, and (c) a small repair fund of £150 or £200.”

He was quoting from a letter of the Commissioners. He had referred to the Act, and believed that a church might be built under that Act without having any district assigned to it. What this Act did for men of large means, his Bill, to a certain extent, proposed to do for men of moderate means, and of a humbler rank of life. The Church ought to be the Church of the poor as well as of the rich. Other objections had been made to the Bill. It was said by some persons that the Bill would establish Nonconformity; but he was quite at a loss to see how it could have that effect. Nonconformity practically was established and endowed already. It had established and endowed itself. And why? Because the restrictions under the existing law were so great that large bodies of men burst through the bonds they were unable to enlarge. The Bill would have the contrary effect of providing Church of England services for those who were now compelled either to live without religious services altogether or to resort to those provided by Nonconformist bodies. Somebody else argued that the Bill would establish congregational worship, and said—"You are going to establish a chapel in every parish in the kingdom." If this were necessary, it would be requisite to pass a far more drastic and stringent measure than the quiet, cautious, and frequently-considered Bill which he now asked the House to adopt. He noticed that objection, not because it was a sound or strong objection, but because it had been urged by men of considerable ability, and his answer to it was this—"If you say this Bill is to establish a chapel in every parish, how extremely rotten the whole system must be. All laymen must be in a state of semi-revolt against their pastors. I, who advocate this measure, do not say I am going to establish a chapel in every parish in the kingdom. I say the effect of the Bill in that way will be very small. I only profess to deal with certain cases of neglect, and these cases are extremely few." Another point to which he would call attention was as to what had been the opinions of the Bishops and clergy on the subject. Now, this Bill had almost the unanimous assent of the Episcopal Bench. With regard to the clergy, his own impression was that there was a slight majority of the clergy in favour of the measure. They were, perhaps, about equally divided. On one occasion last year, at a clerical meeting, when the question was discussed, the votes on both sides were even. However, on that subject he had some evidence from a very good source. Some time ago a gentleman was kind enough to send him particulars of a discussion which took place at a rural deanery—he would not say what rural deanery. At that meeting there were 14 persons present, and the result of their consideration of this Bill was that, by a majority of 8 to 6, they passed a resolution to the effect—

"That considering how greatly Mr. Salt's Bill interferes with the parochial system, affects the position of incumbents, and risks the introduction of division and strife into parishes, this Chapter cannot approve the provisions of the said Bill."

If the gentlemen who voted for this proposition had watched the progress of ecclesiastical law during the past 40 years, and had also examined the provisions of his Bill, they would have seen that endless Acts of Parliament had been passed which more or less interfered with the parochial system—some of them cutting away its principle altogether—and that his measure did not propose or attempt to do anything of the kind. Then it was said that the measure affected the position of the incumbents; but those who said so could scarcely have read the Bill. How did it affect the position of the incumbents? It did not touch their revenues in a single iota; it did not interfere with their rights and privileges in going about among the parishioners; it did not interfere with the incumbent in the least with respect either to the revenues or to the performance of his pastoral duties; because before a Bishop could issue a license under the Bill he must ascertain whether the incumbent was actually performing, or was willing to perform, his duty and supply services of which the parish had need. The Bill would only interfere with the right of the incumbent to do wrong by neglecting his duty, and no one could reasonably oppose the measure on that ground. Lastly, it was said that the measure would lead to division and strife in the parishes. Well, there were abundant instances of strife and division in the parishes; but this measure was one which would rather heal than create sores. It was an attempt to realise the wish of the late Rev. Sidney Smith, and raise "the English clergy to the privilege of Dissenters." What was their position at present? His friend who had sent him the report and resolution of his rural-deanery meeting could never have read or heard of the following passage, which recently appeared in a well-known Review, and which was an extract from a Review published early in the present century:—

"In any parish of England any layman or clergyman, by paying 6d., can open a place of worship, provided it be not the worship of the Church of England. If he wishes to attack the doctrines of the Bishop or the incumbent, he is not compelled to ask the consent of any person; but if by any evil chance he should be persuaded of the truth of those doctrines, and build a chapel or mount a pulpit to support them, he is instantly put in the Spiritual Court, for the incumbent, who has a legal monopoly of this doctrine, does not choose to suffer any interloper; and without his consent it is illegal to preach the doctrines of the Church within his precincts."

The object and intention of this Bill was to deal with spiritual neglect, and with wide or crowded parishes. He should have liked to stop at that point, but was bound to say something more. There was another point pressed upon him both by his friends and his opponents, which did not actually relate to spiritual neglect in parishes, but to a very different matter. He was bound more or less to answer the question—"How does this Bill affect rival parties in the Church?" Well, this Bill, as he had already said, was not brought in in any party spirit; its honest and clear intention being to deal simply with spiritual neglect in parishes. At the same time, he felt bound to acknowledge what had often been repeated to him—that this Bill might be used for the purposes of party warfare. But to whatever uses the Bill might be put, it was in itself absolutely impartial. Any person, of any opinion whatever—whether High Church or Low Church, or any other Church—was equally at liberty to make use of the measure. It would be difficult for its provisions to be used for party purposes, because the sole duty of a Bishop, when applied to to put the clauses of the Act in force, was to ascertain whether the services asked for were necessary for the good of the parish. He would go a step further and ask whether, even supposing the Bill were occasionally used for party purposes, that would not be, on the whole, better than the present system. In a parish well-known to himself, there were two churches served by the same clergyman. In one church the service was plain and old-fashioned, in the other it was very ornate. Peace and friendship had almost invariably reigned in that parish. Each service was a safety valve for the legitimate desires of certain of the parishioners. Men of experience were of opinion that in dealing with the parochial system attention should be paid to the nature of clerical appointments. A man who was extremely young and very indifferently educated, and wholly without experience, might be appointed to some parish which required great energy, great tact, and great knowledge. Once appointed, however objectionable his conduct might be to the parishioners, however near he might go to a violation of the Ecclesiastical Law, however he might fail in character and morals, it was almost impossible to remove him. In a case of that kind, would it not be far better, instead of, as often happened, driving away the parishioners into other parishes or into forms of worship which from their habits, education, and tastes they disliked, to give them an opportunity, at least for a temporary period, of carrying on worship agreeably to their opinions? The liberty of doing so was enjoyed in the fullest degree in every other religious community. He had endeavoured by this Bill to provide a remedy for an evil which, he believed, he had shown to exist in certain cases. He asked for the members of his own religious community that liberty which, as he had said, was enjoyed by every other religious community in this country—namely, the liberty of carrying on their own worship according to their own consciences. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving that the Bill be read a second time.

SIR HENRY DRUMMOND WOLFF, in seconding the Motion, expressed his opinion that the Bill of his hon. Friend was in accordance with the comprehensive character of the Church of England. It had received the approval of a large number of Prelates and of many thoughtful clergymen. It would produce union rather than strife in parishes, and would maintain and strengthen what he believed was the best part of our parochial system. The consideration which most induced him to support this Bill was that it would give scope for the various kinds of thought which existed in the Church of England. In London and other large towns, where free and ample expression was given to those varieties of thought, that odium theologicum which was so strong in country districts was very rare. He read some time ago of a watering-place at the South of England where the population were armed against each other, and old friendships broken up on account of the position of the organ in the parish church; and near his own parish a dispute with reference to the position of the pulpit ended in a Commission to inquire into the veracity of the rector, which Commission was presided over by a county Member, whose verdict in favour of the clergyman produced a contest at the last election. In country districts such quarrels were inevitable. There were facilities for their weekly recurrence, and the irritation was never allowed to subside. As his hon. Friend had observed, Nonconformists were allowed to build chapels as they liked; restrictions were put only on members of the Church of England. The result of the present restrictions was that free churches of England had been established in several towns. His own conviction was, that if some such measure as that now proposed should not be passed, the process of disestablishment would be greatly facilitated. What they really wanted were Churches of Refuge, where those persons who did not agree with the incumbent's mode of conducting the services might have preaching and ceremonies with which they could sympathize. He trusted that hon. Members on both sides of the House who looked upon the Church, not merely as the vehicle of their own views, but as a great national institution, would relieve her of those cumbrous restrictions, which breathed the spirit that had deprived the Church of the followers of Wesley, and which were now driving away many earnest men who felt and knew that there was a place for them in her territory but declined to be tied down to the monopoly, or it might be called the infallibility for particular incumbent. He trusted that by affirming this Bill the House would allow the Church that fair field and full play for energy and zeal now only enjoyed by those who rejected her communion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Salt.)

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, he had opposed with considerable energy the Bill which his hon. Friend (Mr. Salt) introduced on a former occasion on this subject. He did not propose to take that course with regard to this Bill. He thought the Bill previously introduced was a dangerous Bill. His hon. Friend had very much modified it, and the machinery of the Bill would thereby be made to work much better. He did not agree with the hon. Member for Christchurch (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) in saying that the churches we needed were "Churches of Refuge:" refuge meant shelter from something evil, and he could not look on any form of worship in the light of evil. The Bill had been modified vitally in the clause which gave the incumbent the option of providing the desired services. The Bishop, too, had antecedently to make up his own mind whether the services in question were, or were not, wanted. Then, the incumbent had the choice himself of providing them. This provision would, he believed, very much relieve the Bill from the character it formerly possessed, when it appeared to present a pistol at the head of the incumbent. Another concession which his hon. Friend had made was that when a matter came to trial the Commission was to be composed of five members, of whom the Bishop had only the appointing of one, and that one had been limited to the existing category of archdeacons and rural deans, while the remainder were equally divided between incumbent and parishioners. There was a further improvement in the Bill in the omission of the clause for creating a special privileged class of private chapels. He did not think that the existence of the privilege of the Peerage was any reason for creating a privilege of plutocracy, which the Bill of last year would have done. There were, however, points omitted which, he thought, had much altered the Bill for the worse. When the measure first came before the House it contained a special prohibition against the celebration of marriage being one of the items which the Episcopal licence would include; but there was no such prohibition now, and he thought the creation of what might prove to be almost clandestine places for the celebration of marriages would do no good to anybody. Therefore, he trusted that at some future stage of the Bill the former prohibition as to the celebration of marriages would be re-inserted. What was wanted was not fresh marriage stations, but opportunities of public worship. People need not always be marrying and giving in marriage, having the banns put up, and all that sort of thing. Again, the Bill, as it formerly stood, contained the following clause:—

"No seat shall be let for hire, and no fee shall be charged for admission in any chapel or building wherein Divine service is celebrated under this Act."

This was a valuable provision, as it excluded the commercial element from the Bill. The measure would not be worked on the old system of proprietary chapels, of which he had hoped everybody was ashamed, and which now only existed as remnants in a few corners of London. A return to such a system would be intolerable. It might perhaps be argued that the Bishop could prevent this, but how could he? A chapel might be licensed and an excellent clergyman procured; but if both ends did not meet the persons interested would go to the Bishop and say—"If you won't let us have pew-rents we will shut up shop and drop the whole affair." It would require a very strong-minded Bishop to reply—"Shut up shop, then, and be bankrupt." He hoped the clause prohibiting pew-rents would be re-introduced when the Bill was in the Committee stage. If pew-rents and marriages were prohibited, if the time for giving notices were revised, and if a fair consideration were given to the minimum number of persons entitled to petition for the privileges to be accorded, he thought the Bill might be safely sent to "another place," where those persons sat who, from their position, were even more familiar than Members of the House of Commons with such questions. If the Bill produced dissension in parishes he should be very sorry; but he gave his hon. Friend credit for endeavouring to prevent that result. Most people, he believed, agreed that in the broad and comprehensive Church of England there ought to be a certain elasticity of worship; and if the present measure increased elasticity without introducing flabbiness, it was desirable to pass it. Therefore, he would not on this occasion interpose such opposition as he had offered to the Bill in previous years, when it was submitted to the House in another form.

Motion agreed to.

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS (RETURNING OFFICERS) BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR HENRY JAMES, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, it was very similar to that which was introduced last Session. That Bill was read a second time, the House approving of the principle of it, as far as any principle was involved in it, and it was then referred to a Select Committee. There the matter was fully discussed, and the evidence of returning officers and other persons most interested was gone into, the result being that the Committee reported in the very terms of this Bill both in relation to the clauses and the amounts mentioned in the Schedules. Under these circumstances, he need only very briefly state the purpose and object of the Bill. The charges of returning officers had become, according to the views of many Members of this House, and also of candidates, very excessive, and far beyond what the law allowed. There were, however, words in the Ballot Bill which gave opportunity for returning officers to contend that they were entitled to make these charges, and it was very difficult indeed for candidates to argue with returning officers as to their rights to make the charges; indeed, it was almost impossible to refuse to pay such charges, whatever they might be. But these charges were not only excessive, but they were exceedingly uncertain in amount. In some constituencies; indeed, great liberality had been shown by returning officers who had devoted their attention to procure economical expenditure, and had given their services gratuitously in many instances or had made only reasonable and fair charges. In other places the expenditure had been reckless as regarded the number of clerks and their payment, the representative of the returning officer in each booth, and the personal charges of the returning officer. He did not wish to refer to instances which could be freely given; but a Return had been obtained by the hon. Member for Mid Somerset which showed that in many cases these charges amounted to nearly £3,000. There was one peculiar example in the county of Bucks, where, although the contest was not a very severe one, the charges were very high, and altogether disproportionate with those in other constituencies. He believed he expressed the general feeling of the House when he said that the charges were excessive and that their inequality ought to be removed. The Schedules had been carefully prepared with a view to the attainment of this object. There was only one matter of principle involved in the Bill—namely, in the third section, which required that candidates before being nominated should deposit the sums they were liable to be charged under the Schedules. Perhaps the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) might take exception to this section on the ground that it tended to ratify the principle of the payment being made by candidates instead of by the ratepayers. They must, however, take things as they found them. This House had decided that candidates should continue to bear the expenses, and had refused to put them upon the rates, and so long as this remained they must act in accordance. As to the future, if the hon. Gentleman brought forward any measure to effect the change he desired, that would no doubt be freely and fairly discussed, and anything he urged would be decided upon its merits. But so long as candidates were to pay these expenses this difficulty remained—a candidate who was insolvent might present himself, and the returning officer might expend £1,000 on his behalf, and he had no remedy to recover the share of the expense of the insolvent candidate, and he could charge the other portion against the willing and honest candidate. An instance of this kind took place in the case of the election for Haverfordwest. A candidate presented himself, whereupon the returning officer thought he had a right to make a demand for a deposit, which the candidate refused to pay. Upon this the returning officer wrongly considered he had the power to refuse the nomination, and he made an unopposed return in favour of the present Member (Lord Kensington), who was unseated, and had to undergo a second election. It was the wish of the returning officers themselves that this security should be given to them. It would be in the option of the returning officer to apply for the deposit or not. In many cases he would not, perhaps, make any such application; but it was only right that he should be secured from any loss.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir Henry James.)

MR. CHARLES LEWIS said, he had always been of opinion that the true reason why the charges of the returning officers amounted to considerable sums was because the candidates, and not the ratepayers, had to pay them. If the constituencies had been required to pay them there would have been no necessity for this Bill, as the charges would in that case have been kept within moderate limits. One of the chief provisions of the Bill was that a considerable sum should be deposited by candidates to cover the returning officer's expenses. This provision, again, was only rendered necessary by the existing law, which made the candidate pay the returning officer's expenses. On this subject, as on some others, he differed altogether from most of those who sat on the Ministerial side of the House; but he had never yet been able to understand why the constituents should cast upon the candidates the expenses caused by their assembling to give their own votes under the presidency of their own returning officers. When the proper time came he should have no hesitation in asking the House to support the proposition that such expenses be paid by the constituency, because they ought to pay for the election of their own Members, and he believed the practice would tend to purity of election. If they went into Committee on this Bill for the purpose of dealing with the items in the Schedule he should call attention to the fees of the sub-returning officers, which he considered in some cases were too small.

MR. FAWCETT said, before the Bill was read a second time, he should like to make one or two observations. He thought, to say the least of it, the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman who moved the second reading of the Bill was extremely inadequate. It was true the Bill was rejected last year; but the House generally did not know in what form it would be brought forward. Looking at the Bill itself there were one or two points upon which his hon. and learned Friend (Sir Henry James) gave them insufficient information. It did not seem to him at all certain that the Bill would reduce the fees of returning officers. In fact, there were hon. Members in the House who could prove conclusively that in elections appointed under the Schedules of this Bill the expenses of returning officers, instead of being decreased would be very considerably increased, in some cases by no less than 50 or 100 per cent. Apart, however, from these details, the Bill was based upon a radically unsound principle. If we were to have excessive expenses of returning officers, they would not prevent them by this Bill. What they must do would be to interest the constituencies themselves in economy. Now, constituencies were encouraged in extravagance; and the more the returning officers got from candidates the better it was thought for the trade of the place, and that was the secret of the great expenses associated with the present system. There was no reason, so far as he knew, why a school board election should be less expensive than a Parliamentary election. In many instances, in consequence of women being able to vote, the constituency for a school board election was more numerous, and therefore, a priori, the necessary expenses ought to be greater than those of a Parliamentary election. In some cases he was free to admit that the constituencies in school board elections had not taken proper care of the expenses; but if they looked at the Returns lately laid before Parliament they would find again and again the expenses of returning officers at school board elections were in many instances not one-half, in some cases not one-third, and in one or two instances not one-sixth of what they had been at Parliamentary elections. If they gave constituencies an interest, they would try to decrease the expenses. If constituencies had to bear the expenses of municipal and school board elections, why should they not bear the expenses of Parliamentary elections? Was not a Member of this House just as much a servant of the constituency—did he not, at any rate, do the constituency just as great service—as a member of a school board or a Town Councillor? It appeared to him that the hon. and learned Gentleman who had charge of the Bill ought to be able to give the House some assurance that it would not actually increase the cost of Parliamentary elections, as he thought it would in many cases do. In his own constituency he found that the candidates would have to deposit £1,200, and that was within a few shillings of what was deposited at the last election. He hoped it would be understood that the Bill would not be accepted as it stood, either as regarded principles or details.

Sir Henry James

CAPTAIN NOLAN said, he wished to offer one or two observations on this Bill. He agreed with the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett), that in many cases the expenses of returning officers would be enormously increased under it. Elections in Ireland were conducted in a somewhat different manner from what they were in England. In Ireland in nearly every polling district there was a court-house, and when that was used the expenses on account of polling-booths were very small. By the Schedule of the Bill it was possible for the sheriff or under-sheriff to charge £7 7s. for the hiring of a polling-booth, and £7 7s. for fitting up the same, and that was a total of £14 14s., which was a large sum of money to pay for such a purpose. Take, for instance, his own constituency (Galway), where the most extravagant sum of any constituency in Ireland was, according to the last Returns, spent on the official items. There the amount expended was only £33s. for each poll-booth. He had consulted hon. Members whose constituencies adjoined his, and they perfectly agreed with him that in no case would more than 4s. or 5s. have been the cost of fitting up the booths. By the proposed system, instead of decreasing the expenses, they would enormously increase them. There was another thing to which he would call the attention of the hon. and learned Member who had brought in this Bill—namely, the charge for travelling expenses. In Ireland those expenses were necessarily very large at elections, because the counties were in no case divided into electoral divisions as they were here in England. This was an important point that the Bill before the House did not notice, and which was equally ignored by the Ballot Act. There was at present no means of fixing how travelling was to be charged for. There was to be considered the journey of the presiding officers to the sheriff, their return, their fresh journey with the ballot boxes, return again, and then the officers' journey home. There were some good points in the Bill, he must acknowledge, but constituencies differed very much. Strange to say, on the point the hon. Member for Hackney had adverted to, the Bill would suit the constituency of Galway exactly, as the franchise was higher there than in the boroughs in England. Some Bill like the present was necessary, but it would require a great deal of revision before it was passed.

MR. GREGORY pointed out that the Schedule of the Bill already met the objection raised by the hon. Member, and remarked that it was said that the Bill would tend to increase the expenses of the returning officers; but he did not see how that could be, as their expenses were at the present time practically unlimited. What the Bill proposed to do was to put some reasonable limit to the expenses, and prevent such enormous sums being charged as were returned by some returning officers. He highly approved of the remedy the Bill gave to the officer to enable him to recover his expenses where a candidate was put up without his own consent, for which at present he had none. They had travelled rather beyond the limits of the debate by discussing whether constituencies should pay the cost of election, and he feared that if they had to wait till that question was settled before they fixed the relations between the candidate and the sheriff, they would have to wait a very long time indeed.

AMENDMENT BILL—[BILL 33.]

(Mr. Waddy, Mr. Lopes, Mr. Charles Lewis, Mr. Morgan Lloyd.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. WADDY, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, explained that its object was to remedy a defect in the Common Law Procedure Act of 1852, which permitted foreign corporations to sue in this country, but not to be sued. This had been illustrated only lately in a case in which a foreign corporation recovered a large sum of money in this country, and the defendants could not even plead as a set-off the amount due to them from the corporation.

JOHN MITCHEL.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That there be laid before this House, Copy of the Certificate by the Clerk of the Crown for the County of Dublin, of the Conviction and of the Judgment in the case of the Queen against John Mitchel, tried at a Court of Oyer and

Mr. Gregory

Terminer and Gaol Delivery held at Dublin on the 26th day of May 1848:

"Extract from the Government Gazette, published by authority, at Hobart Town on the 14th day of June 1853, containing an official notification of the escape of John Mitchel, and offering a reward for his apprehension:

"And, Copy of any Despatches from the Lieutenant Governor of Van Diemen's Land, relative to the Ticket of Leave granted to the said John Mitchel, and to his escape from the Colony."—(Mr. Hart Dyke.)

CAPTAIN NOLAN said, he rose on the part of some hon. Members for Ireland, and in the absence of his hon. Friend the Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan), to make a few remarks on the Motion just made. It was unnecessary for him to say that he did not sympathise in any way with the past politics of Mr. Mitchel—he did not know what his present politics were—but he did think the conduct of the Crown, if they wished to interfere with the election for the county of Tipperary, which could be the only object of the present Motion, was unfair—he might almost say, unworthy. Whatever Mr. Mitchel's former offences might be, he was in Ireland last year, and the Government might then, if it had chosen, have put him in prison for any offences he had committed. He did not say that he should not have opposed such action on their part. But, at the present moment, there was a constituency in Ireland open for election. He knew nothing of the reason why that election was being held—or rather he knew nothing of the cause which created the vacancy—except that he remembered what a former Member for Tipperary (Colonel White) said in that House five or six months ago in a Home Rule debate. It seemed to him that in the present case the Crown had determined to prevent a contest in Tipperary—and to prevent that constituency from speaking out. By the Crown, of course he meant the present Ministers of the Crown. The proper course, in his opinion, would have been either for the Government last year to have imprisoned Mr. Mitchel when he was over here, or now to have started a Conservative candidate against him. He entirely disapproved of the conduct of the Government in the matter, and, if allowed to do so, should oppose it.

MR. DISRAELI: It may be convenient for the House that I should read a Notice I am about to give of a Resolution I propose to move on Thursday next:—

“That John Mitchel, returned as Member for the county of Tipperary, having been adjudged guilty of felony, and sentenced to transportation for fourteen years, and not having endured the punishment to which he was adjudged for such felony, or received a pardon under the Great Seal, has become, and continues, incapable of being elected or returned as a Member of this House; that Mr. Speaker do issue his Warrant to the Clerk of the Crown in Ireland, to make out a New Writ for the electing of a Member to serve in this present Parliament for the county of Tipperary, in the room of John Mitchel, adjudged and sentenced as aforesaid.”

MR. SULLIVAN: I have only this moment, Sir, entered the House, and I am not aware whether I have been accurately informed as to the exact nature of the Motion before the Chair; but I understand it is a Motion for Papers relating to the conviction of Mr. Mitchel. How is Mr. Mitchel before this House? I should like to ask what cognizance this House has of whatever return the county of Tipperary may have made this day? How is Her Majesty's Government aware, or is there a precedent—it becomes me to speak with diffidence upon the precedents of the House, but I speak in all good faith when I ask—Is there any precedent for these proceedings? Sir, this House sits under a Constitution that has not been the creation nor the draft on paper or a year or a century; but it sits here under forms and precedents established throughout the course of many centuries, and I should like to know whether there is a precedent for these proceedings, that in this Chamber, within almost an hour or two of the time fixed for the Sheriff to receive the nomination for the county, one of Her Majesty's Ministers should rise in this House to overshadow and arrest the choice of that constituency? The electric telegraph has flashed to London the news that Mr. John Mitchel is knight of the shire for the county of Tipperary; but I do not know, Sir, how far the discoveries and the application of science in the transmission of political news have been incorporated with the Forms or usages of this House; and if there be a precedent for this extreme precipitancy on the part of the Government, on finding that they ought to have done something yesterday which they did not do, and therefore running down in hot haste to-night with their Motion before the return of the Sheriff to the writ has reached them. I hope this House will, at all events, take a little breathing time; the British Constitution can endure Mr. John Mitchel, Member of Parliament, for 24 hours, and I hope there is no need of creating in this hot haste a precedent that may hereafter be very dangerous. The electors of the county of Tipperary were asked to select a man to represent them as knight of the shire in this Assembly. They by this time have made their choice. It may be that they have made an unwise, it may be that they have made a wise, choice. Mr. Mitchel's politics are not mine. I have stated that elsewhere, where I had the opportunity ere now. But the people of Tipperary, if they have elected him as their Representative, have done it deliberately. I state here that they have done that act deliberately as their reversal, in the face of all the world, of the ignominious sentence that was passed upon him when he was carried out of Ireland loaded with chains. It is not in the power of this House—though it is omnipotent in all that relates to legislation, I say it with all respect—it is not in the power of any vote of this House to arrest that signal compliment paid by an Irish constituency to the public character of a man with whose political opinions I believe they do not coincide. It is to his fate as a victim of the evil system under which Ireland has groaned, to his broken life, broken fortunes, and health ruined in the desperate cause of his country, that the people of Tipperary have offered this signal compliment in the face of all the world. I said here last year—and perhaps English Gentlemen did not attach sufficient weight to my statement—that the Home Rule Members in this House were the middle party in Irish politics, and that they corresponded somewhat with the like party in Hungary, having the advocates of separation on the one hand, and the advocates of Imperial absorption on the other. Perhaps the House will understand what I said now when our Gambetta has been returned as the most extreme of our Extreme Left—for we have exactly such parties in Ireland. A Member of the Extreme Left, no doubt an advocate of separation, has been returned for Tipperary, if we can trust the telegraph,

When the House has the return fairly before it—when you, Mr. Speaker, in the proper course of procedure, have the document before you on the Table—then let the House deal with this matter. Surely this haste is most unseemly; and I notice that another new precedent is to be set up in this case. Mr. Mitchel was adjudged guilty of treason-felony. If I am not in error, among all the precedents upon your Journals, the last Motion before this House of this kind was that Jeremiah O'Donovan Rossa, having been adjudged guilty of treason-felony, and being now in prison undergoing his sentence, the election was void. That is not the case here. I state upon authority that Mr. Mitchel has obtained the opinion of two eminent lawyers—one an English, the other an Irish barrister—that he is fully eligible, and he is prepared to establish his eligibility before any legal tribunal. But if the trial of a point of law is dexterously to be snatched from the ordinary legal tribunals of the land, and this matter is to be settled upon party principles by a party vote in this House, then I say you do an injustice to Mr. Mitchel to-day that may be the means of doing injustice to any citizen to-morrow. If he be legally disqualified, let the legal disqualification be brought before the ordinary legal tribunals of the land. There is, at all events, a disputed point in this question. It is said that felony may be purged by one of two courses—either by the pardon of the Crown, or the lapse of the time of sentence; and I believe the legal opinion has been given that as Mr. Mitchel did not return to these Realms for the 14 years for which he was transported beyond the seas, though he may be amenable to a charge of gaol-breaking, yet he is not liable for his original sentence. If that be not law, let us have the legal point decided in a legal way. I protest, Mr. Speaker, against the attempt in this House to snatch this question from the purview of legal authorities, and to settle it here by, as I say, a strong party vote. Perhaps, Sir, I should not have said so much had I heard the Motion more correctly; but I, for one, rise to protest against the undue haste manifested—the rush made—to prevent Mr. Mitchel from taking his seat in this House.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER asked, for the sake of the proceedings of the House, and the observance of the Constitutional laws of the country, whether the return for the county of Tipperary had been yet received? Until it was, no one knew anything officially as to the election. The writ was issued out of Chancery, and the return should be brought into Chancery. Until that return was received, no legal act could be done with respect to the election—its validity could not be questioned, or the return quashed. When the return was lodged in the Court of Chancery, it could have been questioned on a point of law on demurrer, or opposed on a question of fact in the Court of Common Pleas, according to the ancient form of procedure which prevailed up to the reign of Elizabeth. Since then the House of Commons had usurped the form of deciding upon the validity of election; but it really stood in the place occupied in that respect by the Court of Chancery before Elizabeth's time. A point arose as to the validity of the return for Tipperary; but he must protest, as a matter of regularity and Constitutional law, against the return to the writ being adjudged invalid by the House of Commons before the return had been placed before them. If it were, he was strongly of opinion that the next return would be held to be void. This Motion, if carried, would create a most unfavourable impression in Ireland.

The House divided:—Ayes 174; Noes 13: Majority 161.

Papers presented accordingly; to lie upon the Table, and to be printed. [No. 50.]

MR. HART DYKE moved that the Papers be taken into consideration on Thursday next.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, that what had occurred showed the great inconvenience of proceeding with an important Motion of which no Notice had been given on the Paper. What had happened? The Irish Members were in the lobby or in the dining-room; at all events, out of the House. They heard that something was being done about the Tipperary election; they came in, and they did not know what it was that was proposed. [Ironical cheers.] How could they know if they were absent? He was informed that a writ for Tipperary was being moved for, and the consequence was, that he threw away and wasted a sound Constitutional speech. This would not have happened if Notice had been given on the Paper of the Motion to be moved on the part of the Government, and he hoped it would not occur again. He was now informed that Notice had been given of the intention to move for a new writ for the county of Tipperary on Thursday next. If so, he thought that was irregular and premature; because the return of the election had yet to be made, and the proper authority had to decide whether it was valid or void, and whether the person returned was qualified to sit. A question of law had to be decided, and it was on the official return alone that it could be decided. Therefore, it was premature and irregular to give Notice of a Motion for the issue of a writ. He hoped the Government would withdraw the Notice of Motion. The time would come when that Motion might be made and when it would, no doubt, be entertained in a proper manner.

MR. JOHN MARTIN: I beg to move that in addition to the Papers ordered, there also be furnished Papers showing the composition of the jury on the occasion of Mr. Mitchel's trial, the names of the jurors, and the proceedings in the Courts of Law with reference to the selection and striking of the jury. I will explain to the House that my reason for doing so is to satisfy hon. Members of the gross jury-packing which has prevented the verdict from having had any moral effect in Ireland.

[The Motion was not seconded.]

Original Motion put, and agreed to.

MR. JOHN MARTIN: I thought I was in Order in proposing my Amendment. If I am now in Order, I move for the production also of the Papers setting forth the names of the jurors who convicted Mr. Mitchel, the proceedings at the trial by which these jurors were selected by the Government, and all such further information as may be required for clearing up to the satisfaction of the House the character of that transaction as a trial in a Court of Law and of Justice.

MR. SPEAKER: Will the hon. Member bring up the terms of his Motion?

MR. JOHN MARTIN was about to place his Motion in writing when—

MR. SPEAKER: I must remind the hon. Member that in accordance with ordinary practice he should give Notice of his Motion for a future day, when there will be an opportunity of considering the terms of the Motion which the hon. Member proposes to submit to the House.

MR. SULLIVAN: It would have been well, Sir, if the Government had adopted the wise course you have suggested.

MR. JOHN MARTIN: I beg to give Notice of my Motion for to-morrow.

(Mr. James Barclay, Mr. Trevelyan, Mr. Fordyce.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said: Mr. Speaker, I am not unmindful of the views expressed on behalf of Her Majesty's Government by the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary—whom I am sorry not to see in his place—on the occasion of the second reading of the Bill introduced last year by my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgowshire (Mr. M'Lagan). The statement made by the right hon. Gentleman on that occasion, if I remember aright, was to this effect—that any measure dealing with the question of game ought to be drawn on so wide a basis as to prove a settlement of the question, and that a Bill dealing so comprehensively with the subject could only be carried through this House by Her Majesty's Government. I admit the force of the view expressed by the right hon. Gentleman; but I have considered it my duty to submit to the House proposals which, in certain respects at least, are new, and which, I have taken care to satisfy myself, will be accepted as a settlement of the question. If Her Majesty's Government be pleased to approve of the principle of this Bill I shall be happy, if it be read a second time, to leave the subject in their hands; and I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that the settlement of this vexed question would be conferring great public benefit no less on the landlords than on the tenants. In recommending this question to the consideration of the House I shall not enlarge upon the moral and material evils and the great public loss which arise from the excessive preservation of wild animals under the existing system of legislation. The Committee of this House which for two years took evidence on the subject collected a mass of information which ought to satisfy unprejudiced persons of the very serious evils which exist; and I think the public are very much indebted to my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester (Mr. P. A. Taylor) for the great trouble and the numerous efforts he has made to bring these evils under public notice. But I cannot allow this opportunity to pass without making my protest against the numerous cases of cruel injustice which are perpetrated under the Night Poaching Acts. Anyone who has observed the convictions under those Acts cannot fail to have been painfully struck by the numerous cases in which highly respectable young men have been committed to prison for offences under those Acts. It may be that a farmer's son or a respectable young labourer, for the love of youthful sport and adventure, goes out in search of hares on a moonlight night, and finds himself pounced upon and committed to prison without the alternative of a fine. Sir, I can assure the House that such cases of injustice provoke very largely feelings of resentment against the vindictive character of these laws, and encourage sentiments from which landlords will be the first to suffer. Surely, Sir, it is time that legislation so vindictive and so oppressive should be swept from the Statute Book. I propose to deal with this question by abolishing the whole complicated system of our existing legislation, which I believe cannot be amended, and substituting therefore a simple measure based upon principles of equity and natural justice which I think should fully recommend themselves to the moderate men on both sides of this question.

Mr. J. W. Barclay

Perhaps I shall most readily explain the provisions of the Bill by stating the principles which I have endeavoured to embody in its provisions. The first principle which I have endeavoured to give effect to is this—that killing wild animals is a right naturally incident to the possession of the land on which the animals may for the time be, and that this right should be protected to such an extent as may be reasonable and necessary. I shall not pause to consider the question of the total abolition of the Game Laws without any substitute, because I am not aware that such a proposal is made by any hon. Member of this House, and, so far as I am able to judge, such a proposal is not supported by public feeling out-of-doors, either in burghs or in counties. I have endeavoured to give effect to the principle which I have stated in the 6th clause, which provides for a simple trespass law directed entirely to trespass in pursuit of wild animals. I do not propose to interfere with the ordinary trespass law, but I propose that it should be an offence under the Bill to trespass upon lands in pursuit of wild animals. To obtain a conviction under the clause, it will be necessary that the trespasser should have some instrument or dog, and further to give prima facie evidence that he is trespassing in pursuit of wild animals. I believe that if this law is judiciously administered it will give rise to no miscarriage of justice, and give no occasion for inflicting punishment upon innocent persons. I have, in drawing up the clauses, endeavoured to distinguish between the incidental trespasser and the professional poacher. For the first offence I provide a small fine, not to exceed 10s., and for the second and further offences penalties not exceeding £5. I think it would be a great mistake in any re-adjustment of the law to insist upon severe penalties, because I think that under an equitable and reasonable system of legislation public opinion will not sympathize with the poacher to the extent it at present does. That sympathy is due to three causes. The first is the severity of the penalties inflicted under the existing law; the next, sympathy with the farmer, who suffers heavy loss from the excessive preservation of game; and lastly, the feeling that these convictions are sometimes obtained on evidence which, in the higher Courts, would not be considered sufficient to warrant a conviction. I shall perhaps best explain the second principle which has guided me in drawing the provisions of the Bill by referring to the views which have been often expressed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright), to whom the farmers and the public are so much indebted for his long and continued efforts for the reform of these laws, and for calling public attention to the evils arising under them. The right hon. Gentleman has stated his opinion that occupants of cultivated and arable land ought to have absolute control of wild animals of every kind upon their land. While agreeing theoretically with the right hon. Gentleman, I think a substantial remedy may be given for existing grievances without going so far as the right hon. Gentleman proposes. The principle which I have endeavoured to give effect to in the Bill is, that the occupant of cultivated and arable lands should have absolute control over the wild animals which live upon his crops. This proposition naturally divides wild animals into two classes — those which live upon the farmers' crops, and those which do not. The valuable wild birds which do not live to any appreciable extent upon tenants' crops I have embodied in a list which I propose to call game. Difficulties may, perhaps, arise as to some of the birds in this Schedule. I am ready to admit that grouse and pheasants in certain seasons and in particular districts do considerable damage : but although I do not profess that this is a perfect Bill, or that it will remedy all the grievances complained of under the existing system, I am prepared to affirm that the proposals embodied in the Bill will remove nine-tenths of the grievances of which farmers complain. Although in certain cases grouse and pheasants do damage to growing crops, it is within a limited area. All the farmers who suffer from game to whom I have spoken on this question have stated to me that, though they might suffer a certain amount of damage from grouse and pheasants, they would be satisfied if they had an absolute control of the hares and rabbits upon their lands. This brings me to the great cause of the grievances which at present exist, and the difficulty which stands in the way of dealing with those grievances in a satisfactory manner. In respect to ground game—hares and rabbits—my contention is this, that the preservation of hares and rabbits by the landowner at the cost of the tenant is an arrangement of so vague, uncertain, and indefinite a character that it does not, and cannot, from the nature of the subject, present conditions which are essential to every contract. I might argue this question on the necessity for Parliament interfering and declaring contracts to this extent null and void, and if I did so it would not be necessary for me to depend on my own views of the farmer's position, for the position of parties to certain contracts may be quite clearly ascertained by the terms of the contracts themselves. I shall give examples of some of these contracts, so that the House may be able to form an opinion as to whether one of the parties can be considered in the free and independent position which the law supposes every party to a contract to be. The first example to which I refer relates not to small holdings, but to estates of very considerable importance in the north-eastern counties of Scotland, and I should state that these conditions are printed regulations not embodied in any special minute or lease. The conditions apply to the whole estate, and are the conditions upon which alone farms upon that estate will be let, so that a farmer who applies for a farm is at once informed that unless he is prepared to agree with the regulations affecting this estate, it is unnecessary for him to make any offer for the farm. The first condition is—

“The proprietor reserves all the game, deer, roe, rabbits, wild fowl, and fish on the estate, with the exclusive liberty and power of shooting, hunting, coursing, and fishing for the same, either by himself, his servants, or others having his permission, tenants under game leases, or their servants, and that notwithstanding any modification or alteration which may hereafter take place in the laws now existing for the protection of the game—no claim being competent to the tenants for damage done or occasioned by or through the exercise of the privilege above-mentioned, nor for any damage done or occasioned by the game itself or by rabbits.”

In this condition the landlord not only endeavours to bind the tenant, but absolutely tries to over-rule the legislation of this country. The second condition is this—

such like—and the fish in the river and burns within and bounding his lands, with power and liberty to himself and others having his permission to hunt and shoot, fish, and sport therein; and the tenant shall be bound to protect the same, and to stop all poachers, and other unqualified persons, and to give due notice of same to the proprietor; and all the tenants are hereby expressly prohibited from keeping a dog or dogs. The tenants are strictly prohibited from keeping or allowing to remain on their farms any person or persons likely to become a burden on the poor's funds. A contravention of the above regulations, one full year's rent falling in arrear, or bankruptcy of the tenant, are hereby specially declared to incur an irritancy of the lease."

Thus the landlord binds the tenants, under the terms which I have specified, to such an extent that if they transgress in any one particular, that transgression would practically terminate the lease. Now, Sir, referring to these conditions, I ask the House to consider for one moment what are the real conditions into which the tenant has entered? For the consideration of a fixed reduction of rent—a reduction which it is alleged is in many cases not made—the tenant undertakes to keep, or allows to be kept, an indefinite number of hares and rabbits, and not only to keep these animals, but to allow them to destroy or consume as much of the crops as the landlord, from the quantity of game which he wishes to be kept, thinks proper. The practical effect of this is that the tenant places his fate and fortune in the hands of the landlord. It is quite true, no doubt, that in comparatively few cases is this privilege which the landlord reserves to himself abused. But even admitting that this were so reasonable, men die, and estates are sold. It, therefore, practically comes to this—that the tenant puts his fortune into the hands of persons whom he does not know, and that to an extent which, if the landlord chose, would be sufficient to ruin him. Surely such a state of matters is an ample justification for this House interfering with freedom of contract, and declaring that such a contract ought to be null and void. But I prefer to argue the question upon this ground—Is this an arrangement of such a nature as the law ought to recognize, and does it contain the essentials necessary to every contract which the law in other cases enforces? If the tenant were bound to keep a certain definite quantity of hares and rabbits, and deliver them to the landlord at a particular time, that would be a contract which would be definite in its conditions, and it could be understood. It might be highly inexpedient, highly injudicious, and contrary to public policy, that such a contract should be made; and in such a case it would be right for Parliament to interfere, and declare such contract null and void. But here the quantity, the conditions, the time of delivery, are altogether vague and uncertain. I do not think that from the nature of the case it is possible that such an arrangement as I have indicated, and such conditions as I have just submitted to the House can contain conditions essential to contract in other cases. I do not ask Parliament to declare contracts of that kind null and void, because I do not think from the nature of the case a good contract can be made—I mean good in the eye of the law. All that I ask the House to do in reading the Bill a second time, is to declare that any arrangement for the preservation of hares and rabbits at the expense of the tenant must be, from the very nature of the subject, so vague, indefinite, uncertain, and unreasonable, in regard to the considerations, as to be wanting in the essentials which every contract ought to possess. This principle I have endeavoured to embody in the 5th clause of the Bill. By the first part of the clause, I assimilate the law of Scotland in a certain degree to the law of England, and give the tenants the joint right with the landlord of killing all wild animals on the land in his possession. Every tenant, it provides, shall have the right to pursue, take, or kill, and to authorize others to pursue, take, or kill, any wild animal on the land occupied by him. If the matter were allowed to rest here, there would be nothing to prevent the tenant at once assigning this right back again to the landlord, the same as is the practice in England, where the tenant, according to the presumption of law, has the right to the game. It is therefore further provided in the clause "that every contract in restraint of this right shall be held and construed to apply to game only." If the landlord attempts to restrict this privilege, the law shall only recognize it to the extent of wild animals which come under the denomination of game. As regards the new jurisdiction to be provided under the Bill, I propose to transfer all serious cases from the justices of the peace to the sheriff. When the penalty does not exceed 10s., the jurisdiction may remain with the justices of the peace. I have been induced to do that for this reason—that in large counties and in outlying districts, offenders may prefer to be tried by a justice of the peace, when the penalty is limited to 10s., rather than to be troubled with the expense of going to the county town. The Bill which is now submitted to the House is not applicable to England; but there is no reason why it should not be made so, if practicable. While I think the proposals of the Bill are equally applicable, and would be as acceptable in England as they would be in Scotland, I have not in the measure now submitted proposed to include England; but if the Bill should pass a second reading, I shall be quite willing to support any proposal to extend it to the southern half of the island. There is no close time provided under the Bill. I have refrained from introducing any provision on that subject on this principle—I look upon these valuable wild birds, which are in the Schedule, very much in the nature of crops; and if the proprietor of the land chooses to begin to reap his crops at an earlier time than it is wise for him to do so, that is a matter for his own consideration. I should, however, make no objection to the introduction of a close time; but only I do not think it is consistent with the principles I have adopted in considering the measure. It may be objected that I have not enlarged on the public grounds on which the Bill should be supported. I have not done so, because practically, if in this matter the interests of the farmers are protected, so will be the interests of the public. The interest of the farmer is to grow the largest amount of crop so as to make the largest amount of profit out of his land; and the interest of the public is that the farmer should be stimulated and encouraged to produce the largest quantity of food in order that they may get it at a reasonable price. The interests of the farmers and the public are identical, and if you protect the interests of the one, you provide for the interests of the other. I shall refer only to one argument against the Bill. It has been said that the farmers themselves might take to the preservation of hares and rabbits. That is an argument which will have no weight with those who are acquainted with the subject. In the low country, shootings let at from 6d. to 1s. an acre, and in few cases does the rent exceed 1s. Everyone who knows anything about the damage which hares and rabbits in considerable numbers do to a farm, will agree that for three or four times that amount no farmer would tolerate any quantity of hares and rabbits upon his farm which would interfere to any appreciable extent with his crops or the cultivation of his farm. It would be far more profitable at present for farmers to take shootings upon lands belonging to other persons; but we know that farmers do not take shootings, and therefore it is not reasonable to expect that they would preserve hares and rabbits to any appreciable extent under this measure. I have touched generally upon the principles which have guided me in framing the Bill, in which I have endeavoured to bring forward as moderate and reasonable propositions as would be of service, and such as ought to be accepted by moderate men on both sides of this question, and I now ask the House to approve of this Bill, because it places legislation in regard to wild animals on a simple, just, and intelligible basis, and respects at once the just rights of the public and of individuals; because it interferes as little as possible with existing privileges, and nothing less will give substantial relief; and, lastly, because it will be accepted as a settlement of a question which has long been a fruitful source of vexation, annoyance, and bad feeling between many landlords and tenants. I beg to move that the Bill be now read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. James Barclay.)

MR. DUNDAS, in moving that the Bill be read a second time this day six months, said, that it was a somewhat invidious thing for any hon. Member in any way connected with Scotland to move the rejection of a Bill on the subject moved by the hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. Barclay). The hon. Member was an able and worthy advocate of the interests of the farmers of Scotland in that House. As they were men superior in their knowledge of agriculture and in the possession of intelligence to the corresponding class in any other country, he fully admitted the responsibility of rejecting the measure—the more so, as there could be no doubt that the farmers had some real grievance on the subject. For his own part he (Mr. Dundas) had no sympathy with landlords who allowed ground game to increase to such an extent as to be vexatious to the farmer and injurious to the cultivation of land, and he believed, that to a great extent, landlords who did so had brought about the agitation that had given some trouble on this subject. The hon. Member for Forfarshire had said that the interests of the farmers and of the public were identical; but he (Mr. Dundas) thought he should be able to point out some details in which the Bill fell short of what was equitable to the owners and in some respects of what would be advantageous to the interests of the public. The main provisions of the Bill were to abolish the Game Laws entirely, and for all time. It would also abolish the law of trespass in pursuit of game, and licences to sell game. It would give the tenant an inalienable right to kill game and wild animals on land in his occupation, and would also abolish all existing contracts from 1877. Speaking in no unfriendly spirit to the farmer, he regretted that a Bill which might, with some alterations, be a good one as regarded the interests of the farmers, should be encumbered by other provisions which seemed to be inequitable, and could not fail to excite opposition in the House. Taking first the question of interference with contract, although opposed to all avoidable interference with contract, he thought that no inflexible rule could be laid down. The Legislature had sanctioned interference with contract in many cases, and each case ought to be argued on its own merits. The injury by hares and rabbits was so great, and the assessment of damages so difficult, and the process of suing a landlord for compensation so distasteful, that he thought the modified interference with contract proposed by the Bill, to the extent of giving tenants a right to kill hares and rabbits only, was not very objectionable, and he would not have moved the rejection of the Bill on account of that provision. One proviso, however, appeared to have been omitted by the hon. Member—namely, that tenants who had now by law a right to claim compensation for damages caused by an increase of game during their tenancy should cease to have that claim, if under the Bill they got an inalienable right to destroy hares and rabbits. Again, the 5th clause rendered the Bill applicable to existing contracts after the 1st of January, 1877, a principle to which he thought the House would never assent. It would practically amount to forcibly handing over, from one person to another, of money's worth without compensation. Moreover, it had always been said that if the Game Laws were abolished it would be necessary to have a stringent law of trespass; but under the Bill, the penalty imposed for the first offence was 10s., including costs, and the value of the animals killed or found on the trespasser. It was not provided that the animals killed should be forfeited, and, therefore, a professed poacher might have a day's sport among the grouse or partridges, and sell the birds he had killed, for a fine not exceeding 10s., including costs. Thus, as the costs would in many cases exceed that sum, the game-owner would practically be fined for bringing up an offender against the Act. Then it was said that the present Game Laws operated, as a discriminating law of trespass; but the trespass clause in the Bill, in his opinion, would operate as an indiscriminating trespass law. There was a great difference between cases of poaching. A labouring man who started a rabbit, and killed it in a moment of excitement and from love of sport, might well be treated with great leniency. The present law did recognize a difference in sporting offences which ought to be perpetuated; but the Bill under notice drew no distinction between such an offence and the offence of a man who made a trade of poaching, who went about with a gang of comrades with faces disguised, or who poached at night. The penalty proposed by the Bill was, he thought, quite insufficient to deter such persons, and a power of inflicting a severe penalty ought to be entrusted to the sheriff, who was an unprejudiced and uninterested judge, and to whose discretion he could well trust not to make a bad use of the powers entrusted to him. Regarding the Bill as it affected the interests of the public as consumers—no fence time was proposed in the Bill, but as the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Barclay) said he did not object to a fence time being inserted in the Bill he would not press that objection. Without a fence time and with such trifling penalties as were proposed by the Bill, game would soon become as scarce in Scotland as it was in many foreign countries. He would not allude to the importance of game as an article of food; but he might refer to the Report of the Committee on the subject, in the Appendix to which it was stated that almost every country in Europe and every State in America had a close time for game birds and also attached heavier penalties to poaching than those suggested by the Bill. In 1872, Parliament passed an Act for the protection of Wild Birds, which the present Bill would virtually repeal, and on that subject he might refer to a telegram from its Paris Correspondent which appeared in The Times relating to wild birds in Germany, and stating that at Halle, during the late severe weather, a society had been formed for feeding them three times a day, in the belief that whatever loss they inflicted on the cultivator was repaid to him a hundred-fold in the destruction they wrought among insects. He did not know whether the Scotch farmers had anything to learn from their German brethren, but there was no doubt that wild birds did good by destroying the insects which injured the crops. He thought the House would not consent to the repeal of that Act; and a fortiori he did not think Parliament would sanction a Bill for repealing laws protecting birds which did no injury to crops, and which were very valuable as articles of food. In conclusion, he begged to thank the House for the indulgence they had extended to him, and to say he thought the Bill, for the reasons he had given ought not to be accepted unless very considerable alterations were made in its provisions; and he would therefore move its rejection.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months,"—(Mr. Dundas.)

MR. M'LAGAN: I agree with the hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. J. W. Barclay) in much that he has spoken, and approve of many of his views, and deprecate as strongly as he does the game clauses in the leases he has read to the House. When I first introduced this question of the Game Laws to the House, I referred to similar clauses, and stated that the existence of such clauses was one of the reasons why I had taken up this question. But I think that my hon. Friend has weakened his case by mentioning that these clauses are exhibited to the intending offerers for a farm before they have ever inspected the farm. If such is the case, there is the less excuse for the tenant, for he then enters into his lease and takes his farm with his eyes open, and there is no excuse for an intelligent man committing himself to an agreement of that character. If we may judge from the Preamble of the Bill, the object of it is to reduce the numbers of certain species of wild animals, and by so doing, diminish the temptation to breaches of law, encourage the cultivation of land, and otherwise conduce to the public welfare. In this object I agree with the promoters of the Bill. No reasonable person now denies that the preservation of game is carried to excess in some places, and that the evils from this excessive preservation are great, resulting often in breaches of the law and in murder, in retarding the improvement and proper cultivation of the soil, and in the demoralization of the population. Many proprietors have admitted these evils, and more particularly the destruction of the crops by ground game, and have allowed the tenants to destroy these animals. But, notwithstanding this liberty to the tenants, there are still great complaints of the damage done by hares and rabbits; for the simple reason, that the action and liberty of the tenants are too often interfered with by the too rigorous preservation of the winged game. Will the Bill accomplish the object that it aims at? It repeals almost all the Acts relating to game; but it still gives an adventitious value to certain wild animals which it designates game by a special provision in their favour, and thus it retains the temptation to breaches of the law referred to in the Preamble. It imposes a penalty for going in pursuit of all wild animals, instead of the dozen or score mentioned in the present Game Acts, and thus the Bill is an extension of these Acts. And with a strange inconsistency, forgetfulness, or neglect—call it which you like—while the promoters of the Bill profess to protect all wild animals, and specially those wild birds mentioned as game in it, there is the omission of a provision in it which would through time lead to the extirpation of all the game. There is no prohibition from killing the game or any wild birds during the close season, nor is there any penalty or restriction whatever for taking their eggs. This taking or stealing of the eggs of wild birds is one of the most common causes of trespass on the lands of farmers, and one of the most effectual ways of extirminating the birds. I approve generally of the proposals in the Bill to mitigate the penalties for trespassing in pursuit of game, and to substitute fines for imprisonment; but I think that, in certain cases, the Judge should have the option of imposing a fine, or of sentencing the trespasser to imprisonment. There is, for instance, a great distinction between one man found trespassing by himself in pursuit of game in the daytime, and another proved to be one of a gang who went out armed at night with the object of killing game, and determined to offer every resistance—yea, even to commit murder—rather than not to accomplish their object. There can be no doubt that under this Bill such offences would be committed as they are now, and provision ought to be made in the Bill for the punishment of the offenders. The 8th clause does not meet the case to which I refer. It applies to a case of actual assault by a trespasser. I would extend the provisions of that clause to the case of one of three or more persons who were found guilty of trespassing in pursuit of game, even though they may not have committed an assault, but may have intended to intimidate or menace by their numbers. I come now to the novel and peculiar principle of the Bill as contained in the 5th clause, which proposes to restrict the tenant in making new contracts, and to prohibit him from carrying out those he has already made. The clause further vests the right of pursuing, taking, or killing all wild animals in the tenants, and allows him to assign over that right to the landlord as regards 14 species of wild birds which are called game. The landlord, however, is still to have the right of pursuing and killing all wild animals, as he has at present on the land occupied by the tenants. In other words, the landlord, in letting his farm, may reserve the winged game to himself, but can only have the joint right with the tenant in killing the hares and rabbits. I think that the House will recognize here an old friend with a new face and a new name. Mr. Loch, who represented the Wick Burghs in the last Parliament, introduced a similar Bill, giving the right in the winged game to the landlord, and the joint right in the hares and rabbits to the landlord and tenant, and making that right in the tenant inalienable. But Mr. Loch foresaw that the consequence of passing such a Bill might be to make two game preservers instead of one, and thus the ground game would be increased to such an extent as to be a perfect nuisance to neighbours, and he therefore provided for such consequences by proposing that a game preserver was to be liable for damage done to a neighbour's property by the hares and rabbits preserved by him. The proposers of this Bill have not foreseen the consequences of their Bill, and therefore they could not be expected to provide for them, and in this respect the Bill is defective. I said that the principle enunciated in this and the next clause was novel, for it is the first time, I believe, that the Legislature has been asked to pass an Act for the preservation of rats or other pests of the farm. It is provided that any one committing trespass by entering or being on any land with any dog or ferret, in search or pursuit of any wild animals, which, of course, includes a rat, shall pay a penalty of 10s., together with the value of the rat killed or found upon him. Surely the hon. Member is not in earnest in asking the House to give its assent to such a provision. I am not one of those who object to an interference with the rights of property, or one of those rights—namely, the right of free contract—where it is found necessary for the public welfare to do so; but we should be quite sure that in proposing such exceptional legislation, the public good will be promoted by it, or the object desired may not be accomplished otherwise. Now, I question much if the public good will be promoted by such legislation in the present instance; I am of opinion that the reverse would be the case. I believe that if this Bill were passed into law, there would be a persistent evasion of this clause. There is no penalty to be inflicted on the tenant for divesting himself of his right in the wild animals;

nor in doing so would he be regarded as having done what is morally wrong, or as compromising himself socially. All the risk which the landlord would run would be that he would have no recourse at law in enforcing his agreement with a dishonest tenant who would take advantage of the position which the law gave him. In England, where the tenants generally hold their farms on a six months' notice to quit, the landlord would be sufficiently protected against such conduct on the part of the tenant; and, in Scotland, the landlord would easily protect himself by clauses in the lease, which might be most prejudicial to the tenant if enforced, and which it would be understood would only be enforced if the tenant would resile from any agreements about hares and rabbits which he may have made with the landlord. And thus the clause would be quite inoperative, and would be another instance of the uselessness of the Legislature interfering with the free contract between man and man. I know of cases where the tenants had permission to destroy the rabbits, and, after attempting to reduce their numbers, requested the landlords to relieve them of the privilege; and a Perthshire farmer stated to the Committee on the Game Laws last year, that though he had full liberty to destroy the rabbits on his farm, he feared that by so doing he would offend his landlord, and preferred leaving his farm to exercising the privilege. There is nothing in the Bill to prevent similar cases occurring again. But a provision which could be thus evaded or treated as a dead letter would be more than useless—it would be vicious and demoralizing in its tendency. For the evasion of any Act of Parliament where no great principle is involved, which is merely disobedience to the commands of the Legislature, knowingly persisted in, tends to deaden the sense of right and wrong in the people, to bring the authority of the ruling powers into discredit, and to lead to insubordination and the committing of greater faults and crimes. I believe, for these reasons, that the passing of such a provision would not be for the public good. It is true that we have had this exceptional legislation before—namely, the interference with the making of contracts; but it was based principally on the disparity of the sexes, or of the ages of the contracting parties, or, in other words, we have had to legislate for the benefit of women and children, because they were not in a position to contract for themselves, and we are now asked to put tenant-farmers on the same level as women and children. I feel convinced that the farmers of England and Scotland do not wish to be placed in such a position, if I may judge from the vigorous protest which one of them made publicly the other day. He protested indignantly against any legislation founded on the idea that the tenants of England were incapable of making an agreement. It is said they are incapable of making an agreement, as they do not contract on equal terms with the landlords. If the laws of the country gave the landlords an undue advantage over the tenants in making their contracts, let such laws be amended or repealed; let the landlords be levelled down to the tenants, and not the tenants levelled up to the landlords, thus creating an exclusive land class whose interests will be controlled by exceptional laws different from those which affect the interests of the other classes of the community. If, again, the landlord possesses an undue advantage over the tenant in making a contract from the natural law of supply and demand, we shall legislate in vain to effect a remedy. It should not be forgot that before a tenant is invested with this inalienable right in the ground game, he has shown himself quite capable of making an agreement by entering into his lease, which involved an outlay of thousands of pounds of his money, and of the annual payment of hundreds of pounds of rent; and are we to suppose after that he cannot make an agreement about hares and rabbits? I regret that I should have to oppose any Bill which attempts to settle this vexed question of the Game Laws. Nor would I have withheld my support from some provisions of this Bill had they not been connected with what is considered an important principle of the Bill, which, if approved of at this time, might with equal propriety be applied to the commercial relations of landlord and tenant generally.

MR. M'COMBIE: Although my feelings carry me further, yet I have much pleasure in supporting this Bill. The obnoxious Game Laws have been and are kept up to foster the pride and ostentation of the rich, and have been the means of creating the dreadful heart-burnings that exist between landlord and tenant on game-preserved estates. It is a grievance that is intolerable. I will yield to no other hon. Member in this House in the respect I bear to many landlords in Scotland, who would rather lose their right hand than do an injustice to their tenants by eating up their crops with hares or rabbits; but who can respect another class who tyrannize over and oppress their tenantry? I am sent to this House almost exclusively by the tenant-farmers of a great county to speak for them; but when I dare say a word in their behalf, it would be difficult to enumerate around how many dining tables I am stigmatized as the most impudent, the most impertinent, and the most dangerous fellow that has ever appeared, setting class against class, and that many a better man has been—well, I am afraid to say what. Partial laws have been the means of setting class against class, and who can deny that the Game Laws are partial laws? My constituents have also been stigmatized as disgracing themselves by sending such a fellow of their own class to represent them; but they proved at the last Election their utter contempt for such animadversions; neither shall such animadversions deter me from doing what I believe to be my duty in the high and responsible situation in which I am placed by the electors of my native county. In corroboration of the justness of the opinions I hold and am now expressing, I will quote the words of one whose voice, though “now silent, yet speaketh;” and whose words will carry weight even in this House—of one whose memory is embalmed in the hearts of the tenant-farmers as the most popular landlord of Scotland in my day—the late Duke of Richmond. A few years before his death he stated at a cattle show dinner at Drumin—“That before he would treat his tenants as some proprietors treated theirs, or advertise his farms, he would rather go and break stones on the road.” His Grace did not make rash assertions. I would ask those proprietors who may feel that his Grace’s language is applicable to them, to weigh well those immortal words, and ask themselves how they have treated their tenants, and how they have treated the poor, the honest cottars? In my native parish, the good old proprietor having gone to his rest, another landlord succeeded, who has turned out almost every man, woman, and child. Innumerable are the poor creatures he has sent adrift; not one, scarcely, has he left behind. After having spent long lifetimes in the reclamation of barren moors and built houses thereon, they are turned out in their old age with their families, and without one shilling of recompense, with nothing but the cheerless prospect of the poor-house staring them in the face. Will it surprise you, Sir, that the farmers demand tenant-right, or will it surprise you that the late Duke of Richmond could not repress his feelings of indignation at such heartless, wicked, mean, and dishonourable conduct, and that he would rather go and break stones on the road than act so towards his tenantry? I trust that this House will pass such laws as will remedy the grievances complained of, and thus show game-preserving proprietors that the world was not made altogether for them, but for the good of the whole community. I beg to support the Bill.

MR. GOLDNEY, in opposing the second reading of the Bill, said, that perhaps it was not quite plain why he should take part in a debate on Scotch Game Laws. He did not profess to know very much about them; but he was clear on one point, and that was, that of all the parties likely to be injured by the passing of the Bill, the tenant would be injured in a variety of ways. Without entering into the general subject of game, he wished to look at the Bill as presented to the House. It professed, in the first instance, to do away with all laws relating to the preservation of game, and it gave in return the most meagre protection that any tenant or landlord, or any person residing in a neighbourhood where game was preserved, could possibly have. Having repealed, or professed to repeal, all the laws relative to poaching and trespass, it limited trespass simply to a trespass in pursuit of wild animals. The construction of the Bill meant a roving right to everybody to go over lands for the purpose of destroying or taking game. In endeavouring to protect the tenant, they would deprive him of the right the law at present gave him with regard to trespassers. He could say—“You have done away with all existing statutes on the question, and the whole community, if they choose, can come and walk over my land." The trespasser could say—"I am not here for the purpose of pursuing wild animals, but to pursue pheasants or grouse, and you have no right to stop me." That was, he contended, the only inference from the law as the Bill was drawn up. They were getting rid of all existing powers of punishment, and giving a latitude to the general community to go over the land of the occupier. In his opinion, the matter required large and careful treatment, and ought not to be dealt with in that indiscriminate manner. But further, in attempting the restraint of contract, the Bill merely restrained the contract between the landlord and tenant. If the law of trespass, as the hon. Member for Linlithgowshire (Mr. M'Lagan) said, was limited simply to the place where it was committed, a man might not only go to the immediate locality, but he would be invited to come. He thought the Bill ought not really to be read a second time. In preventing bands of men going abroad armed, they were preventing not only injury to property, but the destruction of life.

MR. FORDYCE, in reference to the criticisms passed upon the Bill, inquired how it was that so many of the tenant-farmers of Scotland were favourable to the Bill? They were, it was well known, very shrewd men, and they knew very well their own business; and he thought that the fact that they supported the measure, showed that it would not do them the injury the last speaker (Mr. Goldney) supposed. He begged to support the Bill, because he believed it would prevent further game grievances in Scotland. He thought such was the end which both sides of the House had in view. The Bill was an ingenious combination of two Bills which had been some time before the House—the Bill of the hon. Member for Linlithgowshire (Mr. M'Lagan), and the Bill of the late Member for Wick (Mr. Loch). It proceeded on the assumption that game breeders were those on arable land. He found that out of 3,817 farmers who gave in a return, no fewer than 3,202, representing 350,000 acres of arable land, attributed their grievance entirely to ground game. The Bill would give liberty to the tenant to destroy ground game. It had been said that if the Bill was carried, it would be inoperative; but as a large landed proprietor, he could thoroughly say that it would be practically impossible to evade its operation—and he believed, further, that no practical landlord could afford to evade it. While he gave a cordial and general support to the Bill, he must say there were some provisions which he should like to see abolished. He thought, for instance, it was a great mistake to think if the Game Laws were abolished or modified, it would be necessary to have a stringent trespass law. If the Game Laws were abolished, no more would be heard of trespass, for they created trespass by making the occasion or opportunity. One great objection to the Bill had been its proposed interference with contract; but it was worthy of remark that the only alternative scheme—namely, that of the hon. Member for Linlithgowshire—interfered quite as much with contract. There were two ways in which they could interfere with contract. They could in express terms render the making of it null and void, or they could allow it to be made, and take away all legal means of enforcing it—which was what was practically done by the Bill of the hon. Member for Linlithgowshire. He trusted, in conclusion, that if the Government opposed the Bill, they would, at least, promise some redress to the tenant-farmers who had suffered so long, and endeavour to bring in a Bill of their own, so that the Session might not be altogether barren, as regarded Scotch legislation.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, the Bill of the hon. Member sought to do something which was beyond even the power of the House of Commons—inasmuch as it proposed to turn birds into beasts. But his reason for rising was to give the most unqualified contradiction to the aspersions which had been cast by the hon. Member for West Aberdeenshire (Mr. M'Combie) on the landowners of the county he represented. His hon. Friend had a neighbour with whom it was understood he was on very bad terms. That gentleman, in the exercise of his undoubted right, exposed some of his farms to public competition, and changed a good many of his tenants. He was not further acquainted with the circumstances of the case; but at every public meeting that his hon. Friend attended, the vials of his wrath were poured out upon the proprietors of Aberdeenshire, because his neighbour had evicted his tenants, and in some other inscrutable manner offended him. He (Sir James Elphinstone) was an owner, as his ancestors had been, of property in Aberdeenshire; but he did not know that on his own estate, or the estates of his neighbours, any tenant who wished to remain on his farm, and who offered at the termination of his lease a reasonable rent, was not allowed to do so. As regarded his own property, the tenants remained there as long as they pleased, and no man had been evicted; in fact, he had tenants whose ancestors had been settled on their holdings for more than three centuries. They had an absolute fixity of tenure, in so far as the farmers were men of good character and of sufficient means. Farms were continued to families, and at the same time the greatest forbearance was shown to the widows and children of those persons who died during the currency of the leases. As the question had drifted into the matter of land tenure, he wished to say that whenever the Game Laws were discussed, that was the direction in which the discussion drifted. The custom in Aberdeenshire had always been to have rules and regulations in reference to every property, and they were just as well known as the laws of the country. With regard to the late Duke of Richmond, there was no friend in the world that he respected or admired more than him, and it was perfectly true that he did what he found was the custom of the country. There was no estate in Scotland that was managed better than the Duke of Richmond's; but the tenant-farmers in some parts would not take the game if it was offered to them. ["Oh, oh!"] Why, he could give an instance of a large estate where the game was offered to the tenants at 2½ per cent of their rents, but they would not take it. He did not wish to interfere with the discussion of the question, but he simply rose to vindicate himself and his neighbours from the aspersions thrown at them by the hon. Gentleman.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR, in supporting the Bill, said, that he regretted the hon. Baronet had made reflections on his hon. Friend the Member for West Aberdeenshire (Mr. M'Combie). There was no one in the House who deserved so well of all tenant-farmers than his hon. Friend, and from the fact of himself and his hon. Friend having been chosen to represent their respective counties, it was clear that the tenant-farmers of Scotland were not satisfied with the relations which now subsisted between them and their landlords with respect to game, and he therefore, for one, was anxious to see that cause of vexation removed. As to the Bill, he felt that, so far from being sufficient to meet the case, it fell greatly short of that which was required and what would eventually meet with the approval of the House. He therefore hoped the Conservative Members would join in carrying the Bill through the House. It was far short of what the First Lord of the Admiralty, who was Chairman of the Select Committee on Game, would, in his opinion, have introduced for modifying the Game Laws, and he hoped that such a Bill might be brought forward by the Government. With regard to many of the clauses of the Bill, he believed several changes could be made in Committee, and if the House would allow it to pass into Committee, some modifications might be made which would make it a reasonable Bill. He therefore gave the Bill his cordial support, in the full expectation that they would be able to make desirable changes. If they did so, it might answer for a short time, until a total reform in the laws relating to game was effected.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON, in reference to the remark of the hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. J. W. Barclay), that the Home Secretary last year declared it to be his opinion that any legislation on the subject of the Game Laws ought to be so drawn up as to be a final settlement of the question, said, he was perfectly prepared to adhere to that statement, but he hardly thought the House would believe that the Bill now before them fulfilled those conditions. The fact was, as was evident from what had already passed in the discussion, there was a great diversity of feeling with respect to the Bill among Scotch Members. They had heard the hon. Member for Linlithgowshire (Mr. M'Lagan), who for a very long time had studied the question, take the Bill to pieces in a way which left him and those who opposed it but very little to say. If there was that diversity of opinion among Scotch Members, how were they to imagine for a moment that it would satisfy the people of Scotland generally? If they went further, and remembered that there was an hon. Member who yearly had a Bill upon the Table for the total abolition of the Game Laws, it seemed to him that here again arose a difficulty, as those who supported this Bill would not agree in dealing with the question in the manner proposed by the hon. Member for Forfarshire. Although the hon. Member had swept from the Statute Book every enactment which touched wild animals of every description, still he proceeded to set up a kind of quasi new Game Bill, inasmuch as he asked them to establish a new trespass law for a certain class of wild animals. Anyone who read the Bill carefully must see that it was a trespass law which applied to wild animals exclusively. [Mr. J. W. BARCLAY: Wild animals includes game.] He contended that the hon. Member had swept away every penalty which now existed for killing game, and had set up under the Bill, as he read it, game as a distinct class of wild animals. Then the hon. Member proposed to enact a new trespass law for those who went in pursuit, not of game, but of wild animals; and if that proposition were true it struck at once a deadly blow at the Bill. He believed that the tenant-farmers throughout the country were generally opposed to the entire abolition of the Game Laws, unless proper steps were taken to protect their lands from the depredations of the people; and he had no hesitation in saying that nothing was so likely to produce a vast increase in trespassing upon farmers' fields as provisions such as were contained in this Bill, which would remove persons so trespassing in search of game from the penalties of the law. The clauses of the Bill, moreover, showed, in his opinion, that the hon. Member had not carefully considered the evidence which influenced the Committee which during two Sessions very carefully inquired into the subject. The hon. Member would sweep away the dangerous offence of night poaching, which was the introduction of all kinds of depredations, and would enact that a fine for the first offence amounting to 10s., and that amount covering costs, should alone be imposed. That, he contended, was wholly inadequate to meet the offence, and by that provision, the hon. Member would place in the same category the man with whom many people had sympathy, the man who was accidentally and by love of sport led into an act of poaching by day, and the man who made a profession of poaching, and determined to carry it out at night, at whatever risk against the rest of the community. Again, the hon. Member would do away with the close season in regard to various kinds of game, whilst the evidence which had been laid before the Committee clearly showed that certain supplies of game were almost necessary. It was true that people might object to over-preserving; but whilst in Germany they had been obliged to pass a law to restrict the killing of small birds, in other parts of the Continent where Game Laws were abolished after the disturbance of 1848, they had been re-enacted with even greater severity, because the food supplies of the people had been found to be seriously diminished. In Belgium, indeed, the abolition was declared to be intolerable and most prejudicial to the husbandman, whose crops were trodden underfoot by poachers. The diminution of food supply was a consideration which the House could not overlook, and with the cases of Prussia and Belgium before them, he hoped they would adopt no such extreme course as that which was suggested. It should also not be forgotten that the large towns in our own manufacturing districts relied largely for their food on that little animal which was the bête noire of some hon. Gentlemen in that House, so that Parliament ought, he contended, to hesitate before it gave its assent to the repeal of the Game Laws. But he did not wish to be understood as giving his approval in any way to many of the practices that had been described to the House that day. The leases drawn in the form that had been quoted, constituted, he believed, the great exceptions to the general rule. He said that those leases ought to be held up to the reprobation of the country generally; but then he said also that for the sake of remedying a few grievances scattered here and there over the country, they should be very careful before they made up their minds to interfere with the laws of contract, which, he maintained, formed the best part of the history of the relations between landlords and tenants. If the Bill should become law, he very much doubted whether it would have the effect which the hon. Member who had charge of it supposed it would have. No one could shut their eyes to the fact that land in Scotland, especially land that was productive of game of any sort, had increased immensely in value during the last few years. No one could deny that the Scotland of to-day was very different from the Scotland of 50 years ago, and there was evidence before them that the rentals taken for shooting in that country had improved the districts in which that shooting was, by reason of the very large amount of expenditure incurred, not only in the making of roads, but in the improvement of the dwellings of the people who lived there. With the knowledge which landlords had of the large rentals they were able to get for their shooting, and it being just possible that the tenants would not be able to offer them so large an increase in the rent for agricultural purposes as would be an equivalent for the rentals the landlords at present received for shooting, he rather thought that the tenants would find by degrees that the sheep were either taken off the land for deer-forest purposes, or that rents were asked for lands including the shooting which they would not be able to meet in years when crime, disease, and other evils happened to visit the country. The farmer who should take a shooting at a rent which must be very much larger than his agricultural rental would, he believed, undertake a property that would be of a very speculative character. He believed that in years like the last two, he would find that whilst he was bound by his lease to pay a very high rent for his land because he had acquired the shooting, what he received from the letting of it would be comparatively very small. These were points which the farmers of Scotland had to consider in regard to any Game Bill that might be enacted. He might fairly say that he, for one, had never been amongst the bitter opponents of an alteration of the Game Laws; but he maintained that any Bill passed through that House dealing with the question should be a Bill which should deal with the whole country generally, which should assimilate as much as possible the history of the Game Laws in Scotland and England, which should

at the same time respect the law of contract, and which should respect as far as possible the good relations which happily at present existed in most cases between landlord and tenant.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE said, that although the discussion had been sustained principally by Scotch Members, yet he hoped he might be permitted to say a few words. Various objections had been urged against the Bill, with some of which he concurred. Then the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken had pointed out that the trespass clauses of the Bill applied to wild animals, but not to game. He (Mr. Shaw-Lefevre) was quite certain that that could not be the intention of his hon. Friend who had charge of the Bill. A further objection to the Bill was that it included a number of wild animals in the trespass law which were not now included in it. For his part, he did not see any good reason for that. He thought that the Bill as now drawn would make fox-hunting a penal offence. Now, he did not believe that the farmers, as a rule, made any objection to fox-hunting, and it would be a mistake to raise that question. Putting aside these objections to the Bill, he assumed that its main principle was the exclusion of hares and rabbits from the Game Laws, and to that principle he should give his support. He had no doubt a great deal would be said in Committee on the Bill, about interfering with the freedom of contract. They should, however, recollect that but for the penal Game Laws, this property in game would not have any existence whatever. Therefore, if there was no other way of securing to the tenant the enjoyment of the hares and rabbits upon his land, he saw no reason why they should not interfere with the freedom of contract, at least, to that extent. He had always been opposed to those who advocated the entire abolition of the Game Laws, on the ground that if they did so Parliament would be compelled very shortly after either to re-enact those laws, or else to pass a general trespass law. For his part, he must strongly object to a general trespass law. He thought that any attempt to make general trespass a penal matter in this country would be attended with very great inconvenience, which would probably give rise to complaints and to injustice of a very aggravated character, and he was quite satisfied that it would not be safe to entrust the administration of such a law to an unpaid magistracy. Although, however, opposed to the abolition of the Game Laws, he thought there was much to be complained of with respect to them. Nobody who had read the evidence given before the Committee over which his right hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Hunt) had presided, could fail to come to the conclusion that there was a considerable grievance suffered under those laws. That grievance arose mainly from the over-preservation of hares and rabbits at the present time. What, therefore, the House should aim at achieving was the reserving of hares and rabbits to the tenants, and although there were many faults in the Bill, yet understanding that to be the object which his hon. Friend had mainly in view, he should give his vote for the second reading.

MR. STORER said, he could assure Scotch Members that English agriculturists sympathized in many cases with their Scotch brethren, who were suffering from the great evil of over-preservation of game. At the same time, he could not admit that the Bill contained the necessary provision for putting an end to that evil. He quite agreed with the hon. Baronet (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) that probably the real remedy for the evil was to be found in the springing up of a better feeling between landlord and tenant. It was within his knowledge that in very many cases such a feeling had sprung up, and on some very large estates the hares and rabbits were now given over by the landlords to the tenant-farmers. He thought that should the Bill pass into law their Scotch friends might reckon on having a large company in the Highlands next summer; for he saw no reason why any person with a mere certificate and a gun should not walk from one end of Scotland to the other, destroying all the winged game that might cross his path. But that was not the only blot in the Bill. Its great blot, in his humble opinion, was that it interfered grossly with freedom of contract and the rights of property. So far as he knew anything of the feelings of the tenant-farmers of England, they were not men who would wish to assume that landlords were to have no right over the land they had purchased, or who would desire to repudiating any bargain which they had deliberately made. That was the great principle which would be infringed if the Bill were to become law, and he hoped the hon. Member would withdraw it.

MR. ORR-EWING said, he was much grieved by the remarks which had been made by the hon. Gentleman the Member for West Aberdeenshire (Mr. M'Combie) as to the relations subsisting between the farmers and the landowners of Scotland. He must have intended his remarks to apply only to the county to which he belonged, for he (Mr. Orr-Ewing) could assure the House that the remarks of the hon. Gentleman were totally unapplicable to any part of Scotland with which he was acquainted. He believed the character of the Scotch landlords to be that they had at heart equally with their own interest the prosperity of their tenant-farmers. He was sure that his hon. Friend, on reflection, would take the first opportunity of making some explanation as to what he really meant to convey to the House. The hon. Member for East Aberdeenshire (Mr. Fordyce) had stated that the Bill was unanimously supported by the tenant-farmers of Scotland. He (Mr. Orr-Ewing) was not aware that the Bill had been discussed at all in the West of Scotland, and, if he was not mistaken, the Agricultural Society or club of the county represented by the hon. Member who had charge of the Bill last year opposed that very measure. If he could believe that the main principle of the Bill was to exclude hares and rabbits from the Game Laws, he should certainly not oppose the second reading—but was that its principle? On the contrary, he maintained that the main principle of the measure was to abolish the Game Laws altogether, and to substitute a trumpery trespass law. The principle of the Bill was to do away with private contract between landlords and tenant-farmers. He did not believe that the tenant-farmers of Scotland desired such a law as that, and why should they? They knew very well that if, as stated, they did not make bargains on equal terms with the landowners, there were others whom they employed who were in a less powerful position than that in which they themselves stood towards their landlords, and if they were to do away with freedom of contract between landlord and tenant, why should they not prescribe the terms upon which the tenant-farmers should employ their labourers? Why should they not make a law saying that living, clothing, and other things which a man required had so much increased in price that the wages of a labourer should not be less than £2 a-week? Where were they to stop, if they were to do away with that self-acting principle of private contract between man and man? He was as strongly in favour of the Game Laws being dealt with, and protection being given to the tenant-farmers for injury done to them, as any supporter of the present Bill could be, but he wished to see that relief given on a sound principle. The Bill brought in by the hon. Gentleman was one, however, which he himself could hardly have expected to carry. He (Mr. Orr-Ewing) rather thought it was brought in to please the more extreme portion of the county to which he belonged, and with a view to make himself popular by holding out hopes which he knew would not be realized. He really thought that hon. Members should confine themselves to bringing forward measures of a practical nature which would not disturb the harmony that existed, and which would promote the best interests of the country, without paying any regard to the effect which they might have upon their individual popularity.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY, in reply, said, he would detain the House only for a few minutes, and principally in explanation of some points on which a good deal of misapprehension appeared to exist. Very few hon. Members had taken exception to the principle of the Bill, which was simply this—that any arrangement between landlord and tenant regarding ground game must be of so vague and uncertain a character, that it could not possess those elements which were essential to the formation of binding contracts. It appeared to him that the 5th clause did confer upon the tenant the right to take or kill wild animals upon his land, irrespective of the landlord or any one else, and that the latter part of the clause restrained the tenant from making any contract with any person so as to alienate his right in respect to ground game. This did not apply to the landlord with greater force than to any one else. With regard to the objection stated by the Under Secretary for the Home Department, that persons might trespass in search of game without coming under the provisions of the Bill—it did seem to him that the Bill was sufficiently clearly drawn, wild animals being defined to be wild quadrupeds and wild birds. He had not thought it necessary to put in the word “all.” The 6th clause was directed against any person trespassing in pursuit of wild animals of any kind, and that must include trespass in search of game. It did not appear to him that there could be any doubt upon the point, but if there were, the Bill could be amended in Committee. As regarded the question of compensation raised by the hon. Member for Richmond (Mr. Dundas), he understood that farmers would cease to have a claim for compensation in respect to damage done by hares and rabbits, and there was not the least necessity to make provision for that in the Bill. As to interference with existing contracts, he wished to point out that that interference was limited to contracts for the preservation of hares and rabbits, and would not affect contracts for the preservation of game as defined in the Act. If it was sound policy to interfere with contracts on the grounds he had stated, then, for the same reasons, the interference should apply to contracts in existence at the time of the passing of the Act. But that was not the reason that induced him to make the measure apply to existing contracts. There were leases on the same estate that ran out at various times, and if the Bill did not apply to existing contracts, there would soon arise a state of affairs under which the tenant of one part of an estate might have the right to destroy hares and rabbits, while the same right was denied to the tenant of another part. Such a state of things would not be satisfactory either to landlord or tenant. The hon. Member for Richmond had, he thought, rather misapprehended the penalty clause. The penalty did not include the value of the wild animals found on the poacher, the value of the animals had to be added, and the argument, therefore, that a poacher might make a profit out of the transaction, did not apply. He was surprised to hear the Under Secretary defend the Night Poaching Act because the Report of the Game Laws

Mr. Orr-Ewing

Committee, of which the hon. Gentleman was a Member, recommended a modification of the Act. This objection, however, did not touch the principle of the measure, and it was open to the House to make what Amendments it might think desirable in Committee in the way of increasing the penalty. As regarded the abolition of the Wild Birds Protection Act, and of a close time, he thought his hon. Friends had not appreciated the scope of the Bill, because owners and occupiers of land had power to prevent trespass during the whole year as regarded unauthorized persons. Therefore, if they wanted an Act making a close time it could only be directed against landlords and tenants. Now, the landlord and occupier of a farm had the right, in his view, to maintain only such birds as they thought advantageous to the land. With reference to the suggestion that the Bill would put an end to hunting, he did not see how that description of sport could be affected by it. Under the present law, hunting was illegal upon lands without the permission or authority of the proprietor of those lands; and in that respect the Bill did not make any change. He confessed that he had been considerably disappointed with the course which his hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgowshire (Mr. M'Lagan) had taken on the present occasion, and he could only say that if his hon. Friend represented the minds of the farmers of Scotland regarding this Bill, he (Mr. Barclay) must admit that he did not. The House had been treated by his hon. Friend with a somewhat elaborate essay on ethics, to which he must refuse to give his approval. His hon. Friend had hinted that the principle of the Bill was dishonest, and yet he had stated that he was prepared to accept that principle if cause could be shown. That was a principle of ethics of which he could not approve, and he must leave it with his hon. Friend. His hon. Friend had said that the Bill would apply to trespass in pursuit of rats. He (Mr. Barclay) understood that Bills in Parliament were to be regarded as practical measures. Now, the same argument would apply to the botanist gathering specimens upon land, who, upon the same principle, might be prosecuted for theft. But they knew that no such difficulty arose under the common law, and he could not fancy any circumstances wherein the owner, or indeed the occupant of land would think it necessary, without very good and direct cause, to prosecute any person for entering on his farm in pursuit of rats. The hon. Member for Dumbartonshire (Mr. Orr-Ewing) indicated a doubt as to whether he (Mr. Barclay) believed in the remedy he proposed. On that point he would only say that, being possessed with an anxious desire to see this question settled upon moderate and reasonable grounds, and having considered the subject very fully for a good many years, he had failed to discover any better way in which that settlement might be arrived at than that which he had embodied in the Bill. He must confess he was rather disappointed on that occasion that he had not the support of the Under Secretary for the Home Department, because the Bill had embodied a principle similar to, if not so extreme, as that which the hon. Gentleman introduced in his own Bill two years ago, one clause of which provided that an occupier, under certain restrictions, should be entitled at all times to pursue, take, and kill hares and rabbits on his land, any covenant, reservation, guarantee, or agreement with the owner or any other person to the contrary effect notwithstanding. He appealed to the House whether that was not going quite as far as he proposed to do. He had said that his Bill would be approved by the farmers of England, and when he said so, he had in view the opinions repeatedly expressed by the hon. Member for South Norfolk, now a Member of the Government. As regarded the farmers of Scotland, in the East and in some districts of the West, he was satisfied his proposals would be accepted by them fully and completely as affording a satisfactory settlement of the question. When it was argued that there was an interference with freedom of contract, he need scarcely remind the House of the many cases in which Parliament had so interfered—as, for instance, in Shipping Acts, Mines Regulation Acts, Workshop Acts, Acts relating to the relations of attorneys and solicitors with their clients, Agricultural Children's Acts, and the Act of last Session, introduced by the hon. Member for Leicestershire (Mr. Pell), prohibiting contracts for the stoppage of artificers wages. He had touched upon one or two of the misconceptions that existed in regard to the Bill, and he repeated that the measure which he now asked the House to approve of would simply have the practical effect of giving to the tenant a joint and concurrent right with the landlord in the catching and killing of hares and rabbits on the land which he occupied, and providing that he should neither divest himself of it, nor be divested of it by his landlord or any other person.

MARRIAGE WITH A DECEASED WIFE'S SISTER BILL.—[BILL 44.]

(Sir Thomas Chambers, Mr. Morley, Mr. Burt, Mr. Macdonald.)

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR THOMAS CHAMBERS, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that was the seventh time he had moved the second reading of the Bill, not a single line or word in which had been altered for many years past. He had never before made the Motion from that side of the House, and he might, perhaps, feel somewhat discouraged, notwithstanding the success of the measure in times past, by the circumstance that the last General Election had not only transferred power from one party to the other, but had also altered the constitution of that House very materially. Indeed, were it not that he remembered that as long as that measure had been before the House of Commons it had been repeatedly declared on both sides that it was not a party measure, he would not proceed with it. It had nothing to do with the principles of Party politics, or with the controversies which went on between two opposite branches of the Legislature. It was purely a social measure, and did not touch any of those questions on which politicians honestly enough differed widely. He, therefore, ought not to feel discouraged on the ground that he spoke from the Speaker's left. Indeed, he did not know whether he ought not on that account to feel some encouragement, for as it was not a Party measure, and it secured considerable support from those who differed from himself and his Friends in politics, so he brought it forward at a time when a Government was in power which was pledged to introduce measures of social importance—measures in which especially the social welfare of the people was sought to be promoted. Nobody could deny that the measure before the House was for the settlement of a question exceedingly important in the interests of the people. It was said by some that religion had a controversy on this subject. He would endeavour to show that religion, as an element in the discussion was entirely eliminated. It was not a question on which the clergy or members of the Established Church stood on one side, and all other sects on the other—it was a question in which all were equally interested, whether they belonged to the Church or Dissent. He did not deny that some religious persons still thought there was a valid religious objection to marriage with a deceased wife's sister; but, speaking practically and broadly, the idea that any religious objection existed ought now to be considered absolutely settled, for two reasons—first, the most recent and profound scholarship on Oriental questions and on theology was on the side of those who advocated this change in the law, had had found expression in the most emphatic form in the last Commentary on the Bible, published under the sanction of the late Speaker. But more than that, if a question which turned on the meaning of an ancient language might be taken out of the hands of scholars, this had been so taken, and had been settled in absolute independence of that authority by this circumstance. The question was as to the meaning of a law given by inspiration to the favoured people to govern them in respect to their domestic affairs. From the very time that precept was delivered until this hour, there never had been among that people the smallest difference of opinion as to its meaning: so that his opponents had to face this difficulty—that an inspired precept given by an inspired Lawgiver in relation to a matter of adult domestic custom had been understood by the people in the reverse sense to which the Divine Law-giver intended. No opponent of the measure would be willing to say that inspiration had defeated its own object, so that instead of prescribing the duty in respect to marriage in such a manner that the people would understand it, the duty had been so prescribed as that it had been totally misunderstood and acted upon in the wrong sense. The question was entirely one of historical fact, and the historic aspect of this question delivered him from the necessity of arguing the religious question at all. The opponents of the Bill were thus driven to what was really their only reason for supporting the present state of the law, and that was expediency. Was it possible to exaggerate the mischief likely to arise from introducing the doctrine of expediency into the restriction adopted in the marriage law? How many classes of marriages did not many people consider inexpedient, such as the marriage of first cousins and other blood relations, of people of different religions, or languages, or nations? Was it not inexpedient to marry flagrantly out of a person's own rank in life? But who would contend that any of those grounds would justify any community in restricting the freedom of marriage? In marriage, freedom was the law; restriction could only be justified on the ground that it was contrary to the law of God. Did the Constitution of this country in its statutes, or the Church in her doctrines, lay down any grounds of expediency? Nothing of the kind; the statute law, 32 Henry VIII., c. 38, declared "All persons to be lawful that be not prohibited by God's law to marry." The marriage he sought to render valid was therefore in accordance with the statute law. In the address to the parties who came to be married, they were forewarned that if they were joined together contrary to God's law, theirs was no true marriage at all; thus affirming in the strongest terms that marriage was good in the sight of God if it was in accordance with God's law. The inference was irresistible, therefore, that marriage with a deceased wife's sister was a valid marriage. If, then, it could not be said that such a marriage was contrary to God's law, and it was considered a question in which expediency should have no place, what was the policy of maintaining the present state of things? Perhaps, it might be said that the interests of the whole community should be consulted, and that interference could only be justified by the result. Of all the interferences with social life, those with marriage had been more productive of evil than any other social restraints whatever. The history of centuries throughout Christendom in respect to the restriction of marriages was a history of the most flagrant social corruption. Was this particular restraint in conformity with the moral sense of the community? Quite the opposite was notoriously the fact. He did not deny that many persons had a sentimental objection to marriage with a deceased wife's sister; but as regarded the moral sense of the community nothing could be more baseless than to affirm that it was not in conformity with that sense. Thousands of such marriages had been contracted in all classes of the community; and with what result? Were the parties who contracted them thought the worse of in society? No; they were not considered to have forfeited any claim to the regard of those around them. It would be easy to select names of the highest eminence in every class—including the aristocracy—who had contracted marriages of this kind without incurring the slightest stigma, except from those who entertained the sentimental objection. There never had been a question upon which a more effective mode had been taken of testing the public feeling than had been taken in respect to this Bill, and what had been the result? The number of Petitions had been very large. Considerably more than 1,500,000 individuals had signed Petitions in favour of the Bill—less than 174,000 had signed Petitions against it—208 corporations had presented 793 Petitions in favour of the Bill, and these corporations were representative bodies, constituted with absolute freedom of franchise. *He would admit that it was possible to get up Petitions on any subject; but he thought it a difficult matter when such subject went against the moral sense of the community. He would also say that it was as easy to get up Petitions against as for, and would hint that there existed a Marriage Protection Society, who could have made an effort, if they had chosen, equally as well as the Marriage Reform Society, but whether with the same effect, remained to be seen. Take Scotland, which the friends of the Bill used to consider against them. In early days, in deference to the feeling in Scotland, the Bill was not made applicable to that country. In one debate, an hon. Gentleman—now in the Admiralty—moved an Amendment which he (Sir Thomas Chambers) would have supported, to the effect that it was not expedient to have a different marriage law for different portions of the United Kingdom. That Amendment was carried—as he thought, properly. But what was the condition of things now in Scotland? There were 81 corporations in Scotland, all of which—at least, with very few exceptions—had petitioned in favour of the Bill. Those corporations met in convention once a year, and that convention had petitioned the House in favour of the Bill; so that a Presbyterian community of Established and Free Churches, which must be hampered to some extent by the doctrines of the Westminster Confession, came and asked for this change in the marriage law. From Ireland, Petitions had come both from the Corporation of Dublin and from the people of that city. These instances furnished a sufficient criterion of the state of public feeling. Then, as to the Church, he was glad to think that a feeling of sympathy between the clergy and their flocks was widening upon many subjects. 500 clergymen of the Church of England in the metropolis and the vicinity had petitioned in favour of the Bill, which also had many friends in Convocation. Of the Roman Catholic clergy, 88 of the most eminent men in Dublin had petitioned in favour of the Bill, that civil validity might be given to a marriage which was sanctioned by their Church. Some people urged that the Bill would conduce to immorality. Dr. Vaughan, Dr. Hook, and other clergymen of wide experience were in favour of the Bill. Were not such men in the interests of morality? They had better opportunities than most people of ascertaining public feeling, and they supported the Bill. Men who had the best opportunities of knowing the effect of the existing law emphatically condemned it. He thought further that as it was hopeless to wait for perfect unanimity in favour of any legislative proposal, Parliament was bound to regard with deference the large and important expression of the people's views, which had already been made known. It was worthy of remark also that, in addition to the large numbers of individuals and corporations already referred to, the principle of the Bill had been supported by the late Lord Palmerston and Earl Russell, and many others had strongly advocated this measure. Its supporters now included a long list in both Houses of Parliament. A considerable proportion of the Members of the present Government had voted for the Bill over and over again. Years ago, the present Archbishop of Canterbury signed a Petition, in which he said—

“Whether the question is considered in a religious, moral, or social point of view, such marriages are unobjectionable, while in many instances they contribute to the happiness of parties and the welfare of the motherless children, and among the poor have a tendency to prevent immorality.”

The late Archbishops of York and Dublin, Dr. Musgrave and Dr. Whately, supported the measure, and four Bishops recently voted for it. At that moment England and three or four colonies were the only places in the whole of Christendom, European and Transatlantic, where these marriages were not lawful. Quite lately three Australian colonies—South Australia, Victoria, and Tasmania—had passed Acts legalizing marriage with a deceased wife's sister. Who would presume to say that the Queen, under the advice of the Privy Council, had given her Royal Assent to a law likely to promote immorality? If restraints on marriage were urged on the ground that a Christian nation should not take the liberty to contract matrimony, where circumstances and affection pointed to it, then we were on the edge of a dangerous precipice. We now stood almost alone as regarded the Empire of which we formed a part. The Cape of Good Hope, New Zealand, and another colony—he had forgotten which—were about to send Acts over shortly for the Royal Assent, following in the wake of the Australian colonies. Although other Gentlemen were now in Her Majesty's counsels than those who advised the Royal Assent in the previous cases, he had no doubt that in this matter they would follow the example of their predecessors, and then we should have the whole of the colonies enjoying the privilege of contracting such a marriage as he advocated, and England standing alone. What had been lately done in Germany? A new marriage law had been passed which put marriage with a deceased wife's sister on the same footing as any other marriage. It had been objected that the Bill would have a retrospective operation—that its object was to put those persons right who had broken the law. With regard to the point he thought it only just, and that it would be a gross thing to make the law only prospective. Priests used to be forbidden to marry, and the Act which took away the restriction was retrospective as well as prospective. Had it not been retrospective they might have had this anomalous state of matters — that on the same day six priests might be coming from church with their brides, while other six priests were being taken from Newgate to be hanged at Tyburn for the felony of getting married. When, in 1835, Lord Lyndhurst introduced his measure on the subject, the Bishops expressed their willingness to assent to it upon condition that it should be only prospective. Lord Lyndhurst took the Bill under that condition, and it was sent down to the House of Commons in that shape. The objection, however, was raised that the scope of that Bill was too limited, and it was understood that the error should be corrected, but that had not been done up to the present time. The present Bill did not propose to alter the law, but to make the law consistent with itself, and to show that the Act of Henry VIII. and the doctrine of the Church should have free scope in this country. It could not be said that the proposal was hostile to the moral sense of the community, for the Bill had been sent up to the other House seven times, as he had already stated, and on one occasion had only been rejected by a small majority of 4. He therefore urged that as it had been so long before the country, it ought now to be at once settled. If it were a question respecting an alteration in the Parliamentary franchise, the Lords would not have rejected the Bill with a remonstrance from the Commons. Perhaps, when the Bill again reached them, they would treat it with more respect, for the people were more earnest on the subject ^{now}

than they had been during the last 40 years. In conclusion, he had great pleasure in moving the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir Thomas Chambers.)

MR. ARTHUR MILLS, in rising to move as an Amendment, that the Bill be read a second time that day six months, said, that he entirely agreed with the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Marylebone that that was not a Party measure, nor did he consider it a question involving a controversy between the two Houses of Parliament. There could be no doubt that the Bill had been sent up to, and rejected seven times by, the House of Lords; but there was another fact which ought not to be overlooked, and that was, that during the last 15 years the Bill had been three times rejected by the House of Commons. No doubt, also, a great many Petitions had been presented in favour of the measure, and he did not undervalue them; but it was notorious that there had been an artificial agitation on the subject, and his Parliamentary experience warranted him in believing that on many questions of less importance than this, it would have been possible to obtain a very large number of signatures to Petitions. The hon. and learned Member had stated that there were 1,500,000 signatures attached to Petitions in favour of the Bill; but he (Mr. A. Mills) should not be at all surprised if there were as many signatures to Petitions in favour of the person called "The Claimant," now sojourning in the moors of Devonshire. He was not at all undervaluing the importance of Petitions under certain circumstances; but he must say he thought there had been a great deal of "tall talk" with reference to the number of signatures attached to the Petitions in support of this Bill, both in the circulars recently sent to the Members of the House and in statements made elsewhere. It was stated on a previous occasion, by a former hon. Member for Bradford, by way of illustrating what was the opinion out-of-doors on this question, that every man in Bradford wanted to marry his deceased wife's sister. Of course, if that statement was correct, it represented a strange state of things, because it implied that every man in Bradford was a widower. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman whom he saw opposite (Mr. Forster) would tell the House whether the opinion in Bradford now on this subject was the same as when that statement was made. At all events, he ventured to say that the tone which had been adopted in reference to the Bill, and the statements about the public opinion out-of-doors, had been grievously exaggerated up to the present time, and that in that way the agitation in favour of the Bill had been kept up. The question was, whether the agitation was not supported by those who had already broken the law of the country, and who therefore wished to secure for themselves an indemnity, and to destroy that marriage law which he would undertake to say nine-tenths of the intelligent men and women of England desired to be upheld. This Bill, said the hon. and learned Gentleman who moved its second reading, was a Bill simply to legalize marriage with a deceased wife's sister. The hon. and learned Gentleman assumed that if the law was altered as he proposed, it would end there, and that there was no danger of any further infringement in respect of marriages of affinity. Indeed, he (Mr. A. Mills) believed it had been said in a former discussion of the matter that it was altogether idle to suppose that an alteration of the marriage law simply in this particular would lead to further alterations of that law. He would, however, ask the House what would be the consequence if that state of the law which now prevailed on the Continent—not on all the Continent, as the hon. and learned Gentleman represented, for in Russia and those countries where the Greek Church prevailed these marriages were not allowed—but in those countries in which the marriage laws had been relaxed, were extended to this country? There were abundant facts which could be adduced to prove that if this alteration were made they would be logically bound to extend it further; he believed that if the Bill were passed it would introduce chaos and confusion into our marriage laws, because it would be impossible to refuse concessions exactly collateral to that which was proposed by this measure. He had read a day or two ago in The Saturday Review quotations from The

Mr. Arthur Mills

Almanach de Gotha, from which it appeared that within recent years there had been only four instances of marriages in the Royal and "Illustrious" Houses, with which the book dealt, between men and their deceased wife's sisters, one of a man with his brother's widow, but no less than six between uncle and niece. That, at least, proved that in countries where the marriage law had been relaxed, marriages were sanctioned which were absolutely abhorrent to the feelings of the people of this country, and abhorrent, he believed, to the feelings of the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone. If we relaxed the law, were we prepared to have the law in such a state that everybody might marry any one he pleased?—which he believed would be the result of a relaxation of the marriage law? He believed that public opinion was against every notion of marriages between uncles and nieces, and between aunts and nephews. But if this Bill were to pass, the experience of the Continent of Europe warned them that such marriages would become inevitable. The question of the representation of women in that House was on the tapis. What might be the issue he did not venture to predict; but certainly as long as women were unrepresented in Parliament, it behoved the House to be very careful in their legislation to consult the reasonable feelings and the interests of women. He ventured to say that if the women of this country should ever be included in our representative system the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone would not be again returned for that borough as the advocate of this Bill. The hon. and learned Member for Marylebone alluded to the feelings and the necessities of the working classes. He (Mr. A. Mills) would not yield to the hon. and learned Gentleman in his anxiety that their legislation should take full account of the feelings and necessities of the poor. The hon. and learned Member had mentioned the names of several eminent men, both statesmen and clergymen, who were of opinion that the proposed relaxation of the marriage law would be absolutely good to the poor, and was desired by the working classes. The hon. and learned Member said very truly that this was not a party question. He (Mr. A. Mills) would quote Liberal authorities who were greatly respected in that House and in the country. Lord Hatherley, speaking on the Bill in the House of Lords in 1870, said—

“I know something about the poor, and I am confident they will be the class least affected by the Bill. The poor marry early, and it is very seldom among the poor that a widower finds a sister of his wife unmarried. . . . The first time I opposed this Bill ‘elsewhere’ a clergyman wrote to me saying that—‘You have ventured to say that the poor do not desire this Bill. I know 20 or 30 cases in which widowers were ready to marry their deceased wives’ sisters.’ I replied that I would recant all I had said if he would state, on his own authority, that he was prepared to furnish names and addresses so that I might inquire into the facts. I never heard anything more from him. . . . I inquired in my own neighbourhood in two parishes, containing 60,000 people and 40,000 poor; and, after employing a very active person to search, I could only hear of one such marriage. However, one of the newspapers, which objected very strongly to my view, said that a City missionary, who had made inquiries in the same district, had found two more. So, after scouring the whole field we found three such marriages among 40,000 poor.”—[3 Hansard, cci. 950,951.]

In the House of Lords, Lord Selborne, speaking on this Bill in 1873, quoted a Scripture-reader's letter to himself—dated April 26, 1861—as follows:—

“Being in daily and constant association with the labouring and poorer classes, as one living among them, and being in their homes in the most poverty-stricken neighbourhoods; intimately knowing hundreds of the families of the superior working men, and also of those in the deepest poverty; being in the habit for years past of daily teaching many of the children of the very poor, and also being gratuitously occupied in reading . . . every Sunday to upwards of 200 men of the labouring class. I know from my own observations and conversations I have had with many on the subject of the proposed Bill, that the marriage with the deceased wife's sister is not approved, and is very rarely to be met with among them.”—[3 Hansard, ccxiv. 1906.]

The hon. and learned Member told the House that all arguments of a Scriptural or ecclesiastical nature were now abandoned by the opponents of this Bill. He (Mr. A. Mills) did not agree with that statement. But he would frankly say that he attached far more importance to what he ventured to call the moral and social aspects of this question than to its religious or ecclesiastical aspect. There had been much ridicule on the subject of what was termed “the abolition of sisters-in-law;” but he maintained that a great and serious question was involved which should not be treated lightly—namely, whether a widower was to be deprived of that comfort which he would naturally derive from his sister-in-law, and be placed in an uncomfortable and anomalous relation towards that member of his family who was the most natural person to be the consoler of his sorrows. He based his opposition to this Bill mainly upon the social and moral aspects of the question. It was not because the ancient constitutions of Christendom forbade these marriages—it was not because they were forbidden by the Code of Theodorus, or deprecated by the venerable authority of Ambrose and Augustine and Basil—it was not because they were uniformly opposed by Lutherans, Calvinists, and Presbyterians in Scotland, in Geneva, and in France, that he resisted this Bill, but because he believed that, if passed, it must necessarily revolutionize the home life of this country, and that it would place at the mercy of the self-interested wire-pullers of an agitation which was fostered for the purpose of giving immunity to those who had already broken the law, the most solemn and precious relations of our domestic life. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the rejection of the Bill.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word “now,” and at the end of the Question to add the words “upon this day six months.”—(Mr. Arthur Mills.)

MR. SERJEANT SIMON said, he rose with great reluctance to take part in the debate, and should not have done so had it not been for the attack just made on those who were anxious for the passing of this Bill. He regretted that the hon. Member for Exeter (Mr. A. Mills) should have spoiled his otherwise moderate speech by the attack he had made on those who had promoted Petitions in favour of the Bill. If there had been no Petitions in favour of the Bill its promoters would have been met with the objection that no public interest was felt in it; but when the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone referred to the Petitions which had been presented—many of them signed by corporate bodies—then it was said that they had been produced by wire-pullers, agitators, and dangerous persons. There was no necessary sequence between the Bill and the cases he had quoted from The

Almanach de Gotha. The object of the Bill was not to make the marriage laws logically consistent, but to meet a practical grievance, and in that respect to legislate according to the principles upon which alone legislation took place in this country. The measure was produced because it was required in order to meet a practical grievance from which there was more extensive suffering than the hon. Gentleman seemed to imagine. He denied the assertion that they asked to change the marriage law in the sense intended by hon. Gentlemen opposite. When he heard it said that the supporters of the Bill intended to change the marriage law, to revolutionize the whole social life of the country, and produce mischief on the domestic hearth, he wondered what had become of the memory and experience of at least some hon. Members in the House who must remember that before Lord Lyndhurst's Act was passed, widowers contracted marriages with their deceased wives' sisters. Such marriages were not prohibited by the Common Law of England, although under the Canon Law they were voidable in the life-time of the parties. What was the condition of the social life of our country before Lord Lyndhurst's Act was passed? Were domestic jealousies and differences, domestic unhappiness and suspicion prevalent? They heard nothing of the kind. He did not care to refer to the experience of two of the most Christian and most civilized countries of Europe—Holland and Germany—but he appealed to our own social experience in these realms to show that before the passing of the Act of 1835 there was nothing like social disturbance or domestic unhappiness arising from the fact that a man might marry the sister of his deceased wife. A distinguished foreigner once remarked to him that in England we never passed a law because it was right, but because it was required. In this case the change demanded was not only required, but it was right; and hon. Gentlemen opposite who were so ready to reject the Bill had no idea of the misery and the suffering which were entailed by its being refused. Among the Jewish people these marriages had through all time, as far as history or tradition showed, taken place. They were a people particularly free in their social intercourse, and particularly pure in their domestic life—a people who respected as much as any in the world all the sanctities of the domestic relations. As a member of that community he had known of these marriages amongst them; but he had never heard it hinted that there was any ground of unhappiness, or any feeling of jealousy or suspicion on the part of any Jewish woman with regard to her sister. It would be urged that before the Act of 1835 these marriages were voidable provided the Canon Law was enforced; but he protested against the authority of an ecclesiastical law which at least one-half of the people of this country did not recognize. Speaking for the very large class of the population which he represented, he could say that they were almost to a man in favour of this—as it was called—change of the law. With regard to the opinion of the working classes, he represented a borough with a population of about 70,000, chiefly composed of working men, and he had scarcely ever visited that borough without being questioned as to his views upon this subject. The hon. Member for Exeter (Mr. A. Mills) said the Bill aimed a blow at the relations of private life, and deprived the widower of the benefit of the consolation of his sister-in-law; but if a widower had to marry again, and had to seek a mother for his children outside the family of his deceased wife, he had to break with all the sacred connections of the past, with all the tender reminiscences of his youth, and if he wished to lead a tranquil, not to say a happy, life, he must repudiate all his past connections and memories. Was the widower deprived of his sister-in-law's society before the passing of Lord Lyndhurst's Act? Were the Jewish people or the people of Holland or Germany subject to the same deprivation? The objections that had been urged were mere mythical speculations without any substantial foundation. The very fact that Lord Lyndhurst's Act recognized all past marriages of this description as legal put an end to the religious objection, for if such unions were incestuous now they must have been then. That Act imposed a hardship upon the people which did not before exist, and it was to reverse that change, and to make these marriages for ever binding, that that Bill was brought forward. He heartily supported the Bill.

Mr. Serjeant Simon

MR. BERESFORD HOPE : Mr. Speaker—I have been long enough a Member to have been often astonished by very monstrous statements ; but, considering that it fell from one of Her Majesty's Serjeants learned in the law, I was never so astonished as I have been in the last quarter of an hour, at hearing the hon. and learned Member say that the Bill which is now before us is to restore the law to the condition in which it stood prior to the passing of Lord Lyndhurst's Act. What was the case before the passing of that Act? Why, that marriages with a deceased wife's sister, like those within the other prohibited degrees, were as illegal then as they are now ; but that the process for arriving at that illegality was an imperfect and a barbarous one, the marriage being voidable, not void. "Voidable" simply meant that the illegality of the marriage had to be proved in the life-time of the two parties. The marriage was known to be illegal, but by a misplaced mercy it was allowed to stand, unless disproved. If the disproof was not effected in a certain technical manner, the law shut its eyes, and refused to know anything beyond the fact that A and B, the man and woman, had had a marriage ceremony performed between them, and so there was no further investigation. Lord Lyndhurst's Act did away with this anomaly for the future, while it must be owned stereotyping it for the past, but with this portion of it our generation is not concerned. Does the Bill of the hon. and learned Common Serjeant say that, unless a process of law shall be instituted in their life-time, the marriage of a man and his daughter shall be lawful now? Does he dare to say that? If he does not, then this statement of the hon. and learned Member for Dewsbury falls to the ground.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON : What I said was, that before the passing of Lord Lyndhurst's Act these marriages were legal at Common Law, and that any impediment to them arose out of the Canon Law, which, unless our Courts recognized it, would have had no force in this country.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE : The hon. and learned Gentleman has not answered my question. He has merely given the authority from which the illegality proceeded. I deal with the statement of a fact. He began his speech by saying that this Bill would restore the state of the law to what it was before the passing of Lord Lyndhurst's Act, and he wound up by saying that he wished to return to that state of things. I tell him that, according to the law before the passing of Lord Lyndhurst's Act, a process of law was needful to annul a marriage between any man and woman, however nearly related by ties of blood, not of affinity ; and unless this Bill does the same, his statement falls to the ground. Now, that has never yet been answered. The state of the law was confessedly barbarous when marriages which are incestuous in the eyes of all people who were in a state of civilization beyond that of the most degraded tribes of Central Africa still required a process of law in the life-time of the two parties—a process which a collusive suit might prevent—in order that the law should be able to recognize the antecedent illegality. I think, then, I need not deal much farther with the arguments and statements of the hon. and learned Member for Dewsbury. He has told us that he is the Representative of a borough with 70,000 inhabitants ; and there he seems to have come across strong propensities for unlawful alliances. I may tell him that at one time I myself was connected with a larger constituency than that of Dewsbury, and that I only came across three instances of a marriage of the sort. One of these was the case of a solicitor, eminent for his services to the Liberal cause in the borough ; another was that of a manufacturer, a warm partizan of the Conservative side, who was so satisfied of my honesty that he gave me his support, though he knew that, if elected, I should vote against the legality of such unions ; the third was a basket-maker, whose politics I did not care to inquire into. I pass now to the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone, who certainly did also astonish me. He repudiated, with all the earnestness of his very earnest nature, any idea of expediency on such a question. Expediency ; monstrous ! The idea of expediency ! You must have right or wrong : away with expediency ! I ask the non-expedient and learned Common Serjeant, then, how he will defend the monstrous anomaly of this Bill, which, whilst allowing a man to contract an alliance with the sister of the deceased wife, forbids the marriage contract with that more distant relation, the daughter of the sister of that wife? Could there be a more ridiculous anomaly? I ask him, again, why he allows an alliance with the sister of a deceased wife, and does not allow two brothers to call themselves successively the husbands of one woman? The relationship is absolutely parallel; and nothing but expediency can—I will not say justify; there is no justification about it—but nothing else than expediency can show the least pretext for a Bill to legalize one kind of marriage and not to legalize the other. I know that the hon. and learned Member professes to be very shocked indeed at the idea of marriage with a deceased brother's widow; and I must say that I know of no man who can look so shocked at the right time as the hon. and learned Common Serjeant. There is not a country in Europe in which such marriage can be celebrated, where the distinction between a wife's sister and a brother's widow exists. In the laws of France, of Germany, and the other States of Europe, the expression is brother-in-law and sister-in-law. In France, by the dispensation of the head of the State; in the Southern States of Germany by dispensation at one time; in Prussia without dispensation, and now without dispensation all over Germany, this marriage with a brother or sister-in-law is legalized, whether the relationship proceeds in the line of two brothers or two sisters; and yet the hon. and learned Common Serjeant can get up here and tell us that the idea of expediency has no place in his conscience. He would allow a man to marry his deceased wife's sister, but he would not allow him to marry his brother's widow or his wife's sister's daughter. That is another difficulty on which he has been long impaled, and off which I will do him the justice to say he has never attempted to wriggle. There is no country in the world in which marriage between brothers and sisters-in-law is legalized, either absolutely or relatively by way of dispensation, in which marriage is not also legalized between uncles and nieces, and nephew and aunts. He may say that that is a curious coincidence. In France it is legalized, in Germany it is legalized, and in Portugal and Spain it is legalized. We know that the so-called Legitimist claimant for the Throne of Spain is himself the grandson of an alliance between an uncle and a niece, a Princess of Portugal, after whose death that uncle, the original Don Carlos, married another niece, who happened also to be the sister of the first wife. Then the hon. and learned Common Serjeant talked of the growing feeling in favour of his proposal all over the country, and professed that nine-tenths of the reasonable people of England—all indeed but a knot of bigots—desired it. Well, if this be so, how is it that the Association in Parliament Street have for the last quarter of a century acted under the single name of Joseph Stansbury? For Mr. Joseph Stansbury I have the utmost respect; but he is the sole representative of a pertinacious body of persons who, we are told, include among them the great and good of the land; but if the cause is so holy and pure, why are its advocates so modest that they are content to blush unseen behind the mantle of Joseph Stansbury? The assertion answers itself. Then the hon. and learned Member told us that he has brought forward this Bill seven times, and he talks as if it had received the approbation of successive Parliaments. It has been sent from the House of Commons to the House of Lords only by three Parliaments, and there thrown out. At one time the hon. and learned Common Serjeant talked of 40 divisions, and there may have been that number of divisions including those on the question of adjournment and on going into Committee upon the Bill; but he is now more modest and only counts up to seven. Let me, on my side, give some further statistics. This Bill has not been before the present Parliament until now; but the measure has been before seven Parliaments; but of those seven Parliaments, how many were there in which this House sent it up to the House of Lords? In how many of them has it been thrown out by this House? In how many of them has it foundered and suffered shipwreck without going to the House of Lords? Out of those seven Parliaments it has only three times got from us to the Lords; in three we rejected it, and once it broke down in this House. In the Parliament which was elected in 1865 it was once thrown out in this House and was never again revived. In the

Mr. Berensford Hope

Parliament which was elected in 1859, and which sat till 1865, it was twice thrown out in this House, and never reached the House of Lords. In the long Parliament which sat from 1852 to 1858, it once crept through a second reading by a very narrow majority in this House, then collapsed mysteriously, and was not heard of again here. So much for statistics. After the measure had been thrown out in the two preceding Parliaments by this House, it was during the successive Sessions of 1870 and 1871 rejected in "another place." What, then, did the hon. and learned Common Serjeant do? I trust the hon. and learned Member for Dewsbury will listen to this for a minute, as it was a transaction in which he had a share, for I recollect a Notice he gave which had something to do with the Episcopal Bench in the House of Lords at that time. But in 1871 the feelings of the hon. and learned Common Serjeant were too much for him. His pet Bill had been twice thrown out by the House of Lords, after having been thrown out three times in this House; and in the month of April, 1871, a public meeting was held in St. James's Hall, the hon. and learned Common Serjeant in the chair—

"To protest against the unconstitutional proceedings of the House of Lords in rejecting a measure which had been repeatedly passed by the House of Commons, and to demand the removal of the Bishops from the House of Lords."

Well, the hon. and learned Common Serjeant being in the chair at that meeting, a gentleman who was not a Member of this House, though he did try to obtain a seat for Greenwich—Dr. Baxter Langley—moved the first resolution, which was affirmatory of that policy. Upon that an amendment was moved and seconded by another gentleman, who had also tried to enter this House for Nottingham and failed—the well-known and generally-respected Mr. Odger. His amendment was not only to remove the Bishops, but everybody else from the House of Lords and to abolish that institution altogether. Then followed a great row. The question was put, and the hon. and learned Common Serjeant declared the original resolution, which only abolished the Bishops, to be carried; but a considerable minority of those who were present and in favour of the amendment were of a different opinion. A vir pietate gravis interposed in the person of an hon. Gentleman who has long been a Member of this House, the senior Member for Peterborough (Mr. Whalley), and the meeting broke up amid great disturbance. After this a certain Motion, which the hon. and learned Member for Dewsbury will recollect appeared on the Notice Paper of this House for some time, and then disappeared without coming on for discussion, either on a Tuesday or Friday. I must remind the House of these things when I find a person in the high legal and judicial position of the Common Serjeant making such an appeal as he has addressed to us to pass his Bill. I must be allowed to point out that all his statements are not strictly accurate, and that the Parliamentary history of the question as he has narrated it is not the same as I read it, while its extra Parliamentary history contains very singular incidents, some of which I have attempted to describe to the House. I could say a great deal more upon this subject. I have often spoken upon it before; but on this occasion I have no need after the admirable speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Mr. A. Mills), of whom I will say that I am glad that the mantle of his predecessor in the representation of that city has fallen upon one so able and eloquent. I cannot forget the eloquence, the devotion, and the fervour with which the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas always opposed this Bill. I cannot forget how Lord Selborne, Lord Hatherley, Lord O'Hagan, Lord Chelmsford, as well as the present Lord Chancellor, and the late Lord St. Leonards, always opposed this fatal change of law; nor how the present heads of the Scottish Judiciary gave vote and voice the same way. But after what my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter has said so well to-day, I will not detain the House longer. Before setting down, however, I must appeal to hon. Members not to put faith in the garbled statements and coloured representations of a society which, after five-and-twenty years existence, can only put forward one ostensible representative—Mr. Joseph Stansbury—as the exponent of the feeling of the educated, the refined, and the virtuous people of this country.

MR. ALDERMAN COTTON said, that much wisdom was expressed on the subject by our Divine Master, when he said that in Heaven there were neither marriages nor giving in marriage. He thought a great deal of foreign matter had been introduced into the debate. The House was distinctly asked to assent to marriage with a deceased wife's sister, and not to marriage with any mother, daughter, sister, aunt, niece, grandmother, or great grandmother. It was more a question of property than propriety. The one single question to consider was, whether it was or was not a proper thing for a man to be allowed to marry the sister of his deceased wife. He (Mr. Alderman Cotton) thought that it was. So far as consanguinity was concerned, there was not the slightest relationship between a man and his wife's sister, any more than there was between a man and his wife before marriage. Who could be so fit and proper a person to take charge of the children of a deceased wife as her own sister? It was notorious that second marriages generally resulted in the first family being turned out of doors; and unless the step-mother was in some way related to them, it was impossible to secure any regard on her part for the children of the first wife. The whole of the arguments against the Bill were of a peculiar and curious kind, and he considered that the opponents of the Bill did not take the most delicate side of the question. They were always assuming a position which could not exist in a family. They assumed that a man, having made his choice from a family of sisters, liked his wife's sister better than herself, and that the whole aim of his existence would be to get rid of the wife and marry the sisters in succession. Such a state of society was not at all proper to contemplate, and the assumption was equally applicable to any woman who visited a man as to his wife's sister. There was no argument in Scripture which justified the opposition to the Bill. True, the Levitical law forbade a man to marry his wife's sister whilst his wife was alive, but it did not forbid him to do so after his wife's death. He hoped the House would strip the opposition to the Bill of the foreign matter that had been introduced, and take a plain matter-of-fact view of the question, whether there was really anything improper in such marriages. He believed it was the fact that thousands of marriages of this kind had taken place, and he had heard the number stated as 20,000. People went abroad to contract these marriages; and if they remained there, the children would be legitimate, whilst if they returned, the issue would be branded with illegitimacy. If for the sake only of these children, he urged the House to pass the Bill. He did not think its operation ought to be retrospective as regarded property, although it should be as regarded the matter of legitimacy. The measure was not opposed to morality, it was in accordance with common sense, and it did not interfere with the happiness and welfare of any body of persons.

MR. MACDONALD: I do not rise, Sir, for the purpose of making any lengthened remarks on this question, but simply to say that I think this Bill should be passed, with the view of removing what I consider a very great scandal existing in many parts of the country. We have refused up till now to legalize marriage with a deceased wife's sister, and what is the result? The result is, that the law is openly set at nought and trampled upon. Among the working classes you find people living in open violation of the law, and receiving no condemnation or reprobation. I therefore ask the House to pass this Bill, in the hope that it will have a salutary effect, and will be the cause of stopping the very gross immorality that exists in consequence of the present state of things.

LORD HENRY SCOTT said, he had never in his life been so astonished as when the worthy Alderman the Member for the City of London asserted that there was no more relationship between a man and his sister-in-law than had existed between him and his wife previously to his marriage. The whole law of affinity was based on the one principle of the unity of man and wife, the relations of the one being made equally the relations of the other—if this principle were broken down in one degree of affinity, all others must be broken down also, and the consequence would be that, if this Bill was passed, we should have men very shortly marrying their deceased wife's niece, a woman her deceased husband's brother, and so on. In that case, he would venture to predict that before many years had elapsed another measure would be brought in for legitimatizing all the children of these marriages born before the passing of the Act, and giving them all the rights of legitimacy. Although he should not go into that part of the subject, there could be no doubt that the religious arguments based upon the Mosaic law were more in favour of those who wished the law to remain as it was than in favour of those who desired to alter it; but the Christian law of marriage, though based on the Mosaic law, was not identical with it, but rested on the one principle he had before stated. Were they really prepared to enter into an entire revision of the marriage law of the Kingdom? because if they passed the Bill, they would have to do so. They could not alter it ever so little without being obliged to go further. In his opinion, to pass the Bill would be to do away with, to a great extent, the sanctity of marriage, and which in these days when there was a tendency to relax moral and religious obligations, would be a sad blow to the morality of this country; he should, therefore, decidedly oppose the second reading.

MR. MUNTZ said, he wished to call the attention of the House to the fact that the hon. Member for Cambridge University had said that the management of the Bill had been entrusted to a Mr. Stansbury, of Parliament Street, who had not changed his name for 30 years. How many times did the hon. Member think a man ought to change his name during that period? He denied that the demand for the legalization of marriage with a deceased wife's sister was the result of an agitation got up by Mr. Stansbury. On the contrary, it was founded upon a belief which had a strong national feeling in the hearts of the people. In proof of that, he might mention that he had that day presented a Petition from the Mayor, Aldermen, and Common Council of Birmingham in favour of an alteration of the law, and another, also from Birmingham, signed by 9,340 persons, of whom at least as many were women as men. Those Petitions were not got up by any agitators whatever, and he would defy any hon. Gentleman who said or who thought otherwise to hold a public meeting at Birmingham, and carry a resolution in favour of the present state of the law. He wished to point out that in Victoria, New Zealand, and Canada, Her Ma-

esty had sanctioned the principle which the Bill would carry into effect, and the consequence was that a man might go out from England and marry a deceased wife's sister in any of those colonies, and all his children would be legitimate; while if, after making his money, he returned to this country, his modest wife would become his mistress, and his children bastards. Now, he asked the House to consider whether that was a desirable state of things to continue, especially when it was borne in mind that in all Catholic countries these marriages were sanctioned directly a dispensation had been obtained, which was invariably granted immediately it was asked for. Under such circumstances, and considering the fact that England stood alone in her dignity with reference to this question, why should they retain a law which was so offensive to a considerable number of the population? Who was more likely to make a better mother to the children of a deceased wife than that wife's sister? And it was, no doubt, that consideration which led to so many of these marriages being contracted. At present people often lived together without being married, in consequence of the existing law in this respect. Surely that was not a kind of immorality which ought to be encouraged merely in order to carry out a fancy. The religious question was all, in his opinion, on the side of the Bill. By the Levitical law, the custom of marrying a deceased wife's sister was not only recommended, but was even made compulsory; the lady was entitled to ask the husband to marry her, and if he objected, she spat on her shoe and struck him in the face, which, although it might not have the effect of making him amorous, at any rate showed her disdain at his refusal. It was also clearly laid down in these words—"Thou shalt not marry thy wife's sister while she is alive"—[Laughter]—no, he did not mean that; what he intended to say was—"Thou shalt not marry thy wife's sister while thy wife is alive." It had been said that the wife would be vexed if she thought her husband, after her death, would marry her sister; he believed the wife would be equally vexed if she thought her husband was likely to marry any other woman; but, as a matter of fact, it was well known that many wives on their deathbeds had entreated their husbands to marry their sisters, in order that their children might be sure of being well cared for. He believed that if a poll of the whole country was taken, there would be a large majority in favour of the Bill, and for this reason and others he had mentioned, he should have much pleasure in voting for the second reading.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, that on the present occasion, he must be taken as offering only his individual opinion on the subject. He thought that if there was such a desire for the Bill as had been alleged, that the hon. and learned Common Serjeant was bound to prove that a considerable number of people in this country were suffering from the law as it at present stood. In his belief the hon. and learned Member had failed to do this. By means of an energetic organization the House of Commons had been inundated with Petitions; but he did not think they represented the real feeling of the country. During the many years the question had been before the House, he had not found that it had been a question at the hustings, or had in any way decided the fate of an election. His own constituency was decidedly opposed to the measure, as he believed the great majority of the people of the country were. There was another portion of the Kingdom which ought to be considered. Ireland had most decidedly protested against the proposed change ever since it was first mooted; and notwithstanding the continued and persistent agitation which had been kept up for so many years, the resistance to it had not abated, nor had the public opinion in its favour grown. In proof of that assertion, he well recollected the late much-lamented Mr. Maguire's appeal to the House not to pass the measure, because the people of Ireland did not want it, and they had also more lately had the opinion of Lord O'Hagan on the subject, who was as strongly opposed to the Bill as Mr. Maguire. It was sometimes said that this was a poor man's question, but statistics on that point proved that a great deal was to be said on the other side. Why was the Legislature called upon to meddle with laws which, as they stood, were distinct and intelligible, merely because a certain number of men had knowingly broken the law? If you relaxed the law with regard to this degree of affinity, how could you justify the law which prohibited marriages in other degrees of affinity—for example, with a deceased wife's niece? Without entering into the religious part of the question, his belief was that the history of Christian marriages was really expressed in our Redeemer's words—"They twain shall be one flesh." The kinsmen of the wife were the kinsmen of the husband, and vice versa; and the Bill, if it passed, would involve the destruction of this relationship. He objected also to its retrospective operation, believing that those persons who had knowingly broken the law had no claim to be relieved from the consequences of their wrong-doing. They could not pass the Bill without setting up a whole system of anomalies which they would find it extremely difficult to deal with; and so far, therefore, as he was concerned, he should have no hesitation in voting against the second reading.

MR. RONAYNE said, he had very little personal interest in the Bill, seeing that his wife had no sisters; but he wished to state, with reference to the Petition said by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Common Serjeant to be signed by 80 clergy of the diocese of Dublin in favour of the Bill, that they only desired such marriages to be legalized, if the parties had received dispensation from the Church. The Roman Catholic Church, however, invariably disapproved such marriages; and so far from a dispensation in such cases being easily got, they were most difficult to obtain; and he knew many influential and wealthy people who had been refused them. With regard to the measure itself, the Catholic people of Ireland were undoubtedly opposed to it.

REGISTRY OF DEEDS OFFICE (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. WILLIAM HENRY SMITH, Bill to amend the Law relating to the Registry of Deeds Office, Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. WILLIAM HENRY SMITH, Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, and Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BRACH.

House adjourned at a quarter before Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, 18th February, 1875.

Their Lordships met;—And having gone through the Business on the Paper, without debate—

House adjourned at a quarter past Five o'clock, 'till To-morrow, half past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 18th February, 1875.

MINUTES.]—NEW WRIT ISSUED—For Tipperary, v. John Mitchel, who has become incapable of being elected or returned as a Member of this House.

NEW MEMBERS SWORN — Edward Vaughan Kenealy, esquire, for Stoke-upon-Trent; John Eldon Gorst, esquire, for Chatham.

PUBLIC BILLS — Resolution in Committee—Ordered—Intoxicating Liquors (Ireland)*.

First Reading—Registry of Deeds Office (Ireland)* [70].

Second Reading—Land Drainage Provisional Order* [66]; Local Government Board's Provisional Orders Confirmation* [67].

QUESTION.

MR. KINNAIRD asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it might not be possible periodically to hold Civil Service Examinations in different parts of the Country; say Edinburgh, Dublin, and Liverpool, so as to save candidates in these cities and neighbourhoods the trouble and expense of coming to London?

THE CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, all ordinary competitive examinations for the Civil Service were held in Edinburgh, Dublin, and Liverpool, as well as in other large towns. They were not held periodically, but as vacancies occurred. In examinations for the higher classes of officers it was found necessary to bring the candidates to London.

NAVY—GOVERNMENT DOCKS—CONCESSIONS TO PRIVATE FIRMS.

QUESTION.

MR. HOPWOOD asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether the use of Government Graving Docks has been afforded by the Government to private firms, one contracting for the completion of the ironclad frigate "Kaiser" for the German Government, and another for the completion of the ironclad "Independencia" for the Peruvian Government; if so, upon what terms; and, if gratuitously, whether the Government was aware that there were other Graving Docks of sufficient capacity constructed by private enterprise for commercial profit?

MR. HUNT: On the 21st of November Messrs. Samuda Brothers applied to the Admiralty for permission to dock the Kaiser in one of the Government dry docks at Chatham. This was refused unless it could be shown that no private dock was available. Upon their replying that there was in the river only one such dock—namely, one at Millwall—which was capacious enough, and that there would be considerable difficulties in getting the ship in and out of the basin leading to the dock, and that the dock was then otherwise engaged, and that time was of importance, permission was granted to dock her at Chatham. No charge was made, for it is not the practice for the Admiralty to make a charge for a ship of war, there being reciprocity in these matters between different nations. I considered that in giving this permission the Admiralty was performing an act of courtesy to a friendly Power. The ship was in dock eight days. With regard to the other ship, the following information has been supplied to me from the War Office:—The dock at Woolwich Dockyard at present occupied by the Independencia is hired by the builders of that vessel at the rate of £180 per month. The builders have also dredged the dock at their own expense and paid part of the cost of repairing the caisson. The vessel in question was taken into this dock at the request of the Brazilian Minister, conveyed through the Foreign Office, as the Secretary of State wished to oblige a friendly Power.

NAVY—TRAINING SHIP IN DUBLIN BAY.—QUESTION.

MR. OWEN LEWIS asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, If it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government, considering the beneficial results which have followed the establishment of training ships in England, to place one in the bay of Dublin?

MR. HUNT: There is no intention at present to establish a training ship in Dublin Bay.

FACTORY ACTS CONSOLIDATION. QUESTION.

MR. TENNANT asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, having regard to the desirability of extending the provisions of the "Factories Act, 1874," to other than textile manufactures, and to the promise given by Her Majesty's Government for inquiry into the subject during the present Session, it is the intention of the Government to ask the sanction of this House to the appointment of a Select Committee, or to advise Her Majesty to issue a Royal Commission, or what other course they propose to take in the matter?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, it was the intention of the Government to issue a Commission to inquire how the Factories Act might best be extended to manufactures other than textile, and also into the health and education of young persons employed in them.

PARLIAMENT—RULES AND ORDERS AS TO INTRODUCTION OF NEW MEMBERS—MR. E. V. KENEALY.

MR. EDWARD VAUGHAN KENEALY, who had been returned to this House for the borough of Stoke-upon-Trent, in the room of Mr. Melly, who had accepted the office of Steward of the Chiltern Hundreds, came to the Table to be sworn without being introduced by Two Members, according to custom:—whereupon

MR. SPEAKER said: I have to point out to the hon. Member that, according to the uniform practice of this House, when a new Member comes into the House for the first time it is usual that he should be introduced by two Members of the House; and I have to ask him whether two Members of this House are prepared to so introduce him, according to the practice of the House?

MR. KENEALY: I am aware, Mr. Speaker, of the practice of the House. At the same time, I am not aware of any law or any rule which deprives the House of the right of administering the oath to me as Member for the borough of Stoke-upon-Trent. The practice of the House, as I understand it, is based upon an Order that was made in February—["Order, order!"]

MR. SPEAKER (interposing): I have to call the attention of the House to a Resolution of this House on the 23rd February, 1688, with reference to this practice. It is recorded in the Journals of this House in these terms—

"The House being informed that it was an ancient Order and Custom of the House, that, upon new Members coming into the House, they be introduced to the Table between Two Members, making their Obeisances as they go up, that they may be the better known to the House; Resolved, That the said order and custom be for the future observed."

This Resolution has been invariably acted on by this House up to this time. I have had diligent search made in the Journals of the House, and I do not find that any departure from the practice has ever been sanctioned. The House will observe that the object of the Resolution appears to be to identify the Member. It is my duty in this Chair to see the Resolutions of the House enforced; but should the House think fit, upon this special occasion, to dispense with its former Resolution, it will give the necessary directions. ["No, no!"]

Here MR. KENEALY interposed, saying: Am I to understand, Mr. Speaker, that you will not hear me on this matter?

MR. SPEAKER: While a question of this nature, affecting the conduct or action of a Member, is under consideration, it is in accordance with the practice of the House that the hon. Member concerned should withdraw.

MR. KENEALY withdrew accordingly.

MR. DISRAELI: I hope, Sir, that in this case the ordinary Rules will not be enforced. The identity of the new Member cannot, I believe, be questioned. Although, for myself, I think the Rule in question an excellent Rule—and it is one which I trust will be strictly observed in the future—yet I think there are circumstances connected with the present case which render it desirable that we should not insist upon its enforcement. I beg to move that the Rule be on this occasion dispensed with.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the said Resolution of the House be dispensed with on this occasion."—(Mr. Disraeli.)

MR. WHALLEY: I regret that, in moving the suspension of this Rule, the right hon. Gentleman, who is of the highest authority in this House, did not think it expedient—it could not, coming from him, be necessary—to state what are the circumstances under which it has arisen. I am surprised to find such reticence on the part of the right hon. Gentleman. Some injury might be done to individuals—not to the hon. Member who has appeared to be presented to the House—but to all those who may take an interest in the event of that Gentleman having been returned to Parliament. I think that the right hon. Gentleman should have stated what were the circumstances under which he has made this Motion. I observe, Sir, in the precedents to which you have referred that there were various customs and ceremonies adopted in old times; for instance, that hon. Members when they came to the Table should not wear their boots, and various other Rules—all these being, I take it, merely made for the convenience of the House, or that the identity of Members who present themselves should be known. It appears to me, Sir, that there is another reason why the right hon. Gentleman should have stated the circumstances and should not have made so formal and so emphatic an allusion to circumstances which he did not state, inasmuch as it was quite competent to take cognisance on the part of the House that some form would be required to be observed. As in a case in which there are no Tellers nominated, so in this case, if it had been known to you, Sir, that no hon. Member would be able to perform the simply Ministerial duty of identifying the individual who has handed in the paper, you might have dispensed with this formal proceeding on the part of the right hon. Gentleman by calling upon some hon. Members to perform the duty.

MR. BRIGHT: I am sorry that, when the hon. Member stood at the Bar, he was not asked whether the fact of his being alone arose from a disposition on his part to disregard the ordinary practice of the House. I think if he coming to the House had wilfully—I may say on purpose—disregarded the ordinary Rule of the House, and refused to come up to the Table with any two Members who might be willing to come up with him, that is a condition of the question which I think would be very unpleasant. I am not sure that it would be more pleasant—certainly it could not be more pleasant to the hon. Member himself—if he had found himself in a position in which he could not secure the friendly services of two Gentlemen to introduce him to the House. Sir, if the latter be the case, I presume that the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Whalley) at least will not object to coming to the Table with the new Member; and although I have not made the acquaintance of the hon. Gentleman, and have never spoken to him, yet, out of deference to the will of a large constituency, if he is willing to accept my companionship to the Table, I have no objection to walk up the floor of the House with him that he may be formally introduced to the Speaker. I think now before the Resolution is passed which the right hon. Gentleman has moved, it would be better, on the whole, to ascertain whether the hon. Member himself of his own free will—of his own obstinate will, if it be so—refuses to observe the Rule of the House—I think the House ought to know that before it passes the Resolution,

MR. SPEAKER: The Question is that the said Resolution of the House be dispensed with on this occasion.

MR. BENTINCK: I venture, Sir, to think that when the House is called on to come to a decision on a Motion for which, as you have informed us, there is no precedent for the last two centuries, the House ought to have more time to consider so grave a matter. I beg, therefore, Sir, to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."
—(Mr. Bentinck.)

MR. DISRAELI: I think it would be desirable that we should come to some understanding on the present occasion. I have no hesitation myself in explaining to the House what I meant by the word "circumstances." I was told that the hon. Member for Stoke-upon-Trent had not succeeded in obtaining two Members to introduce him, and I thought that it might be painful to his feelings to allude to that fact. I therefore thought the words that I used would be sufficiently intelligible. I still am of opinion that it is undesirable that in the present instance we should insist on this Rule; and I feel persuaded that if the debate is adjourned, when we meet again we shall probably adopt a similar Resolution to that which I have proposed. I trust, therefore, that the hon. Member for West Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck) will consider twice before he presses for an adjournment, and that the House will consider the Motion that I have made, and which is approved by many whose authority is great in the House, and that it will allow the hon. Member to be sworn at the Table.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. DODSON: I understand, Sir, that it has been explained and understood that the hon. Member for Stoke-upon-Trent has not been acting contumaciously—if I may use the expression—towards the House, but that he has endeavoured, and has failed, to secure the services of two Members to introduce him. Under the circumstances, I think there can be no further hesitation on the part of the House in agreeing to the Motion made by the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, and that it may be adopted without further discussion.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Resolved, That the said Resolution of the House be dispensed with on this occasion.

Mr. Kenealy was then called to the Table of the House, and sworn.

AND ESCAPE.—Parl. P. 50.

Order for Consideration of the Papers presented [16th February] relating to the Conviction and Escape of John Mitchel read:—

The said Papers read, as follows:—

Copy of Certificate by the Clerk of the Crown for the County of Dublin of the Conviction and Judgment in the Case of the Queen against John Mitchell.

County of the City of Dublin, To wit.

"SEARCH being made amongst the Records of the office of the Clerk of the Crown for the County of the City of Dublin, I certify that one John Mitchell was, at a Court of Oyer and Terminer and General Gaol Delivery, duly holden at the Sessions House, Green-street, in and for the County of the City of Dublin, on the Twenty-sixth day of May, in the year of our Lord One Thousand Eight Hundred and Forty-eight, indicted, tried, and convicted, for that he, on the sixth day of May, in the year aforesaid, and on divers other days as well before as after, feloniously compassed to depose the Queen from the State, Honor, and Royal Name of the Imperial Crown of the United Kingdom, and to levy war against the Queen in that part of the United Kingdom called Ireland, in order by force and constraint to compel Her Majesty to change Her measures and counsels, and such felonious compassing expressed and declared by feloniously publishing in a certain public newspaper, called the "United Irishman," of which newspaper he the said John Mitchell was the proprietor, certain publications dated the sixth of May and thirteenth of May in the year aforesaid, and by divers other overt acts charged and stated.

"And the said John Mitchell, having been convicted of the felony aforesaid, was thereupon sentenced by the Court to be transported beyond the seas for the term of fourteen years.

JOHN MITCHEL — TIPPERARY

RESOLUTION. NEW WRIT ORDERED.

MR. DISRAELI: Mr. Speaker, I wish to address you on a question of Privilege. The electors of the county of Tipperary have returned to this House as their Member a convicted felon—Mr. John Mitchel—who is thereby incapacitated from taking his seat in this House. Mr. John Mitchel was tried for treason-felony in the year 1848. He was found guilty, and sentenced to 14 years' transportation. After a comparatively short period he escaped from his imprisonment, and he has neither fulfilled the sentence which was awarded to him, nor has he received a pardon from Her Majesty under the Great Seal. He therefore remains a convicted felon, and is incapacitated from taking a seat in this House. Under these circumstances, Sir, I therefore beg to move the first Resolution, which is in your hands.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That John Mitchel, returned as Member for the County of Tipperary, having been adjudged guilty of felony, and sentenced to transportation for fourteen years, and not having endured the punishment to which he was adjudged for such felony, or received a pardon under the Great Seal, has become, and continues, incapable of being elected or returned as a Member of this House."—(Mr. Disraeli.)

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, he did not rise to dispute at that moment the facts stated in the Return that had been laid on the Table, nor to discuss the legal or constitutional principles laid down in the Notice of Motion given by the Prime Minister, nor to discuss the applicability of those principles to the case now before the House. He abstained from doing so for two reasons—first, because he thought it only deferential to the electors of the county of Tipperary and the gentleman interested in that matter to allow them an opportunity—when they had seen the legal doubts which had been so suddenly raised by the Law Officers of the Government—of considering what course they would pursue; and, secondly, because neither he himself nor any of those with whom he usually acted had had time to consider and come to any conclusion as to the position laid down in the Motion or as to the course that should be adopted definitely under the circumstances. He had an appeal to make on behalf not only of the electors of Tipperary, but of every constituency in the United Kingdom, who would be affected by any precedent that might be created on that occasion; on behalf also of Mr. John Mitchel, who was affected not only in reference to his title to a seat in that House, but also with regard to very serious charges that affected his character, if any of the statements contained in the Paper laid upon the Table of the House were true. He wanted a little more time, to enable everyone who was interested to consider that question. He did not ask specifically that the matter should be referred to a Select Committee, or that the electors of Tipperary and Mr. Mitchel himself should be permitted to address the House by counsel, or that time should be given in order that the electors of Tipperary might present a Petition, in the now constitutional way, to the Court of Common Pleas. He asked for none of those things, for the time allowed them had been so brief that he could not undertake to bind any of the parties interested to adopt any specific course, but he merely asked for a short time to consider what course ought to be taken. What were the facts of that case? The nomination for the county of Tipperary occurred last Tuesday. Before it occurred, there were several meetings held throughout the entire of that extensive county which were attended by a Gentleman who sat in that House, whose veracity and character were unquestioned—he referred to the hon. Member for Westmeath (Mr. P. J. Smyth). That Gentleman told the electors of Tipperary that Mr. Mitchel came there fortified by the opinions of Irish and English counsel, that any doubt as to his right to sit in Parliament was of no value, and that he had beyond doubt the right to take his seat if he were returned by the county of Tipperary. Now the Irish Government was never slow to speak its mind on what occurred in Ireland; and, notwithstanding the readiness with which it generally put forth its views, it had never, either by notice given to the sheriff or by proclamation, intimated to the electors of Tipperary that they would be running the risk of sacrificing their votes by electing Mr. Mitchel. Mr. Mitchel, he might add, had been over in Ireland last autumn, and everyone in the country was aware that if a vacancy occurred in any popular constituency there he would have been a candidate for the representation. All that time, however, no action was taken by the Government. They might have arrested Mr. Mitchel quietly, without inflicting any great pain upon his person or his feelings, and thus have saved the constituency from giving an ineffectual vote. But they had done nothing of the kind. They had allowed him to come to Ireland, and now that the electors of Tipperary, having for so long a time been lulled into security by the action of the Government, had elected him, what was the course which was taken? The hon. Member for Mid-Kent (Mr. Hart Dyke) had come down to the House the other evening, without giving any Notice, and had moved at half-past 7 o'clock for Papers with regard to Mr. Mitchel's conviction, and his departure from the place where he was imprisoned. He had, moreover, done so on an evening when the business was not interesting, when very few English Members were in attendance, and when the number of Irish Members was naturally very small indeed; so that had it not been for his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Galway (Captain Nolan), with one or two others, the Motion would have been agreed to without opposition, while those interested in affording the people of Tipperary an opportunity of speaking their minds on the question were left only a few hours for consultation between half-past 7 and bed-time. He believed he might add that the first of the Papers which had been moved for had the date of the 10th of February, 1875, and surely the Government on that day knew that Mr. Mitchel's address to the electors of Tipperary was looked for, and would have acted more fairly to the electors and to Mr. Mitchel if they had stated their views on the subject more frankly. The Motion for Papers having been made, it struck the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government that it would be only fair that he should give Notice of the Motion which he had submitted to the House that evening—and what, he would ask, was the result of all those proceedings? Of course the news of what took place in the House overnight would only be spread in Tipperary at 8 or 9 o'clock the next morning—and the result was that there was only 36 hours for the electors of Tipperary to come to a conclusion as to what course they should pursue, to take counsel's opinion, or to become acquainted with the legal bearings of the question and the consequences of the Motion that had been introduced. Mr. Mitchel did not reach Cork until 3 o'clock on Wednesday morning, and he, too, had only the same time left him to consult with the electors as to what should be his line of conduct under the circumstances in which not merely his political rights but his personal character were so much at stake. He thought that he did not use an unsuitable word when he said that that was a very undignified haste that left only 36 hours to the constituencies of the kingdom to consider a precedent that might be perhaps hereafter found applicable to very different circumstances. There were, he might add, legal questions of a very grave nature connected with the subject, which he did not, however, propose on the present occasion to discuss; but if the House would allow, he would read the opinion of a person of great experience in legal matters as to some difficulties which arose in connection with the case. The learned gentleman to whom he referred said that there was a question involved in it which he could not but think ought not to be decided without giving Mr. Mitchel and the electors of Tipperary an opportunity of having the judgment upon it of some legal tribunal. He also said—

"It may be fairly argued, notwithstanding his escape, that he has endured his sentence to transportation. So far as I am able to make out, the sentence meant nothing more than actual banishment from the country. The time for petitioning against the return has not expired, and if the House of Commons determines the matter now, it will take it away from the determination of the legal tribunal."

Now, the Elections Act of 1868 provided that from and after the next dissolution of Parliament, no election or return should be questioned, except in accordance with the provisions of that Act. The learned gentleman of whom he was speaking went on to say that he did not think the case of O'Donovan Rossa at all furnished a precedent for that of Mr. Mitchel, inasmuch as the former was elected while his period, not of transportation, but of penal servitude, was in full force and unexpired. He added that if the opposition to Mr. Disraeli's Motion was rested upon those broad and constitutional grounds, he should hope that they would find themselves supported by many who, though strongly opposed to Mr. Mitchel's politics and courses, would not sanction an unconstitutional and arbitrary interference with electoral rights. Most hon. Members in that House, he (Mr. O'Shaughnessy) dared say, regretted such an occurrence as the election of Mr. Mitchel to that House as a thing that was abnormal and dangerous to the peace of the country; and yet he trusted that they would think that immediate action should not be taken in that case. He would undertake to show that there was some ground for holding that Mr. Mitchel's election had been preceded by some circumstances that varied it from being of such a character as he supposed they took it to be. Mr. Mitchel stood for that county at the last General Election. At that time there was a constitutional agitation going on in Ireland for the attainment of objects to which it was now unnecessary further to refer. Mr. Mitchel polled a large minority of the electors on that occasion, and he was defeated by two gentlemen of high status in the county, Colonel White and the hon. Gentleman who now represented the constituency (Mr. Callaghan). Those Gentlemen, in common with other hon. Members from Ireland, advocated the constitutional changes of which he had already spoken. Those constitutional changes had been brought under the consideration of the House by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt), the writer of the Opinion to which he had just called attention. The proposals made by him were rejected without any offer of compromise, conciliation, or concession. That being so, Colonel White resigned his seat, and then the electors of Tipperary, who had returned that Gentleman on Home Rule principles, began to think what course they ought to take, and determined to return Mr. Mitchel. And surely it was the manly and outspoken way to proceed to declare that, their hope of constitutional redress having been disappointed, they were not prepared to return another Home Ruler to repeat the same arguments to which the House had last Session turned a deaf ear. It ought also to be more satisfactory to those who wished to know the real state of Ireland, that the electors had so demonstrated the intensity of their feelings on the subject, than that they had returned a Tory gentleman who would come down and declare that Ireland, and the county of Tipperary particularly, was tranquil, and that nothing more was required but some local reforms, and thus deceive the House of Commons. He was aware that there was a disposition to identify those who were opposed to the course taken by the Government on the present occasion with the politics of Mr. Mitchel. For his own part, he did not know what those politics were at present. He was aware that Mr. Mitchel had written a letter, in which he expressed his discontent with constitutional agitation; but he was also aware that, in addressing the electors of Tipperary, he stated it to be his intention to advocate, if elected, various reforms in the House of Commons. Perhaps it was his determination to follow in the footsteps of the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. John Martin), who, like himself, had been brought under the ban of the law. Be that as it might, so far as he himself was concerned, he had been brought to think that there was no more immoral course of action than to throw a nation into the horrors of a civil war when there was no hope of redress by that means. He believed, moreover, that the day would come when England would take calmly into consideration the state of Ireland, and when the spirit of conciliation would become so strong, that both nations would meet half way to settle the differences between them. History had taught him that, although Parliament might for a long time refuse to make the concessions which justice demanded, yet in the end they were always granted, sometimes, it might be, under the pressure of political exigencies, as was the case with his own country in 1782. In conclusion, he would move the adjournment of the debate for a week; but if the Government would accede to the appointment of a Committee, or adopt any other course whereby the electors of Tipperary would have an opportunity of discussing and considering the matter, he should with great pleasure withdraw his Amendment.

MR. O'SULLIVAN seconded the Amendment.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."
—(Mr. O'Shaughnessy.)

SIR HENRY JAMES: There is no desire on the part of those with whom I have consulted to throw any obstacle in the way of the Resolution that has been proposed by the right hon. Gentleman if the House should think it necessary and right in order to maintain its high character, feeling satisfied that the right hon. Gentleman and those with whom he has taken counsel are only desirous to take a constitutional course, and one in accordance with Parliamentary usage and custom:—but at the same time, as I entertain some doubts upon the subject I shall be glad to hear the statements of the Law Officers of the Crown. It is simply because these doubts have not been entirely dispelled by the hasty inquiry I have been able to make, that I wish to have the opinions of those learned Gentlemen, whom the right hon. Gentleman has no doubt consulted, and by which the House will probably be in a great measure guided. The doubts I entertain are of a technical nature, and I will explain how they have arisen. It is quite true that Mr. John Mitchel has been convicted of treason-felony and sentenced to 14 years transportation, that he has not completed his sentence. But looking at the question in a merely technical view, it is a question which can perhaps be best discussed before a judicial tribunal, whether that conviction produced the disability sought to be imposed by this Motion. In early times, with few exceptions, all felonies were capital offences, punishable with the sentence of death, and with the sentence of death attainder necessarily followed: and it is to attainder that the disability is attached. When this question arose in 1870 in the case of O'Donovan Rossa, this House resolved, almost unanimously, that—although the offence of which he was convicted was not a capital one and no attainder followed—yet that the disability applied from the fact that O'Donovan Rossa was then undergoing his sentence, and was at the time actually in prison. It is only natural that the House should be willing to follow that precedent without attempting to carry it further, and the present question is whether the precedent applies to John Mitchel's case. The statute 9th Geo. IV., which it is evident the framers of this Resolution had in their minds, appears to me to have no bearing on the matter at all, being merely intended to remove the only disability remaining—so far as I am aware—in relation to felony—namely, disability of a felon to give evidence. But by the Act passed in 1870—an Act to abolish forfeiture for Treason and Felony—it was provided that persons convicted of treason or felony should be incapable of being elected, or sitting, or voting in Parliament until they should have suffered the sentence passed upon them, from which it may be argued that any person convicted before the passing of that Act would not be subject to its provisions and would be capable of sitting in Parliament. Still, I think the precedent established in the case of O'Donovan Rossa ought to bind us unless it can be shown that a distinction between that case and the present exists. It appears to me that the cases do differ essentially inasmuch as O'Donovan Rossa was at the time of his election, actually serving his term of imprisonment and could act no public part until its completion. What I desire to learn from the Law Officers of the Crown under these circumstances is—whether, in the first place, John Mitchel can be proceeded against and remitted to serve out his original sentence, or whether by effluxion of time the sentence cannot be further enforced. If he cannot be forced to complete his sentence surely there is a difference between his case and that of O'Donovan Rossa. Secondly, I wish to know whether, John Mitchel having been convicted under the Irish Act, he could be proceeded against for having broken his prison now that the term of his imprisonment had expired; and, thirdly, if he could not be arrested by reason of what had occurred, what are the disabilities under which he is labouring other than those which are imposed, or intended to be imposed by the vote of this House? No doubt the House can expel a Member on good and sufficient grounds—such as having committed a misdemeanour, or that his conduct is such as to render him not a fit and discreet person to sit here. The power of expulsion, however, is one thing, and the power of declaring a man's disability another. In the former case the House can act upon its own opinion, whereas in the latter case it can only proceed upon the strict principles of law. A person who has misconducted himself, or is even of notoriously bad character, cannot be refused admission to this House, though he may be expelled on good and sufficient grounds being shown. For it is on record that in the time of James I. there was a person of the name of Sir William Harcourt, who had been subjected to no less than 18 sentences of outlawry. Yet "on account of his merit"—which had been continued and perpetuated down to the present time—that circumstance was not considered a sufficient cause to refuse him admission to this House.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said: Before I proceed to answer categorically the three questions of the hon. and learned Member for Taunton, I think it right to point out, that by the case of O'Donovan Rossa, two things were, by an overwhelming majority of this House, established. First, that, notwithstanding the Act of 1868, this House declared its intention to reserve in its own hands the power of deciding such questions as arose in that case, and in the one now before the House; and, secondly, that the incapacity of a convicted felon to become a Member of this House does not depend upon attainder, but upon the judgment passed upon him for the felony of which he has been convicted. I will now answer the questions which have been put to me by my hon. and learned Friend. The first question is, whether Mr. John Mitchel can be remitted to prison in respect of his being at large before the expiration of his sentence?

SIR HENRY JAMES: Whether he can be remitted to prison without further sentence.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: Upon this I would observe that the Act of the 9th Geo. IV., commonly called the Irish Act, which imposes a penalty for being at large before the expiration of a sentence of transportation, differs materially from the corresponding section of the Act of the 5th Geo. IV., which deals with such an offence when committed after a sentence passed by a Court in England or Scotland. Under the latter statute any person found unduly at large before the expiration of his sentence of transportation in any part of His Majesty's dominions is liable to certain penalties; but in the Act of the 9th Geo. IV., which relates to Ireland only, the words used are, "any person found unduly at large before the expiration of his sentence anywhere within the United Kingdom," and any person so found is made liable to the same penalties. Now, Mr. Mitchel having been convicted and transported under the Irish Act, I apprehend that his being at large within the colony of Van Diemen's Land before the expiration of his sentence was not a new offence in respect to which the penalties contained in the 9th of Geo. IV. can attach. The moment after Mr. Mitchel had given up his parole and resigned his comparative liberty, although he was "unduly at large before the expiration of his sentence within Her Majesty's dominions," it was not within the United Kingdom. This I feel bound to say, though the matter has come somewhat suddenly upon me. [Cheers.] Hon. Members who cheered that observation should bear in mind that I am only dealing with the question of Mr. Mitchel's liability to arrest, and I am stating what I conceive to be the effect of the statutes bearing upon the subject, so far as I have been able to look into them. Under a more modern Act, which has reference to tickets-of-leave, there are provisions subjecting the offender to a not very heavy punishment for the offence of breaking the conditions of his ticket; and it also provides for his being sent back to finish that portion of his sentence which he has not endured; but that Act does not apply to Mitchel's case. Upon the whole, it appears to me that John Mitchel could not have been arrested, either by reason of the non-service of the sentence that had been passed upon him, or by reason of his being at large before the expiration of that sentence. With regard to the second question, whether Mr. Mitchel can be proceeded against for breaking prison, the statutes of Van Diemen's Land provide a penalty in the case of persons aiding and abetting the escape of a convict from prison, but they do not, so far as I am aware, provide any punishment for the convict who escapes from prison before the expiration of his sentence. I doubt whether Mr. Mitchel can be considered to have been guilty of breaking prison, but I apprehend that escaping from prison before the expiration of sentence, of which he was clearly guilty, is a misdemeanour at Common Law in respect of which punishment can be awarded; but the amount of punishment would be light, as the offence is not a particularly heinous one; and I think I may fairly say that no person at this time would think of prosecuting or arresting Mr. Mitchel on account of his escape. This explains why no steps were taken last year, when Mr. Mitchel was in Ireland, to arrest him. The third question was as to the nature of the disability under which Mr. Mitchel labours, if he cannot be arrested by reason of what has occurred. This is the substantial question before the House, and the answer to it is, that by his conviction in 1848, and the judgment following upon that conviction, John Mitchel became a felon, and subject to all the disqualifications attaching to one convicted of felony, one of which disqualifications was, according to the view which I take of the matter, the inability to become a Member of Parliament. As I understand the law, as it formerly existed, a person convicted of felony was a felon not for any particular period—for the particular period only of his sentence—but, having been convicted of felony, he would be a felon for all intents and purposes so long as he lived, unless he received a pardon. That, in my opinion, was the state of the law up to a period dating some 50 years back. Since that time, however, various statutes have been passed relieving felons from certain of the disabilities under which they lay. The first of such statutes was the 6 Geo. IV. c. 25, the first section of which provided that in any case in which the King should be pleased to extend his Royal mercy to any offender convicted of any felony, whereby the offender should be excluded from benefit of clergy, and by Royal Warrant under the Sign Manual, countersigned by one of the principal Secretaries of State, should grant to such offender either a free pardon, or a pardon conditional on transportation or other penalty, such pardon or conditional pardon so granted should have the effect of a pardon under the Great Seal. Shortly after that Act was passed, a circumstance of this sort arose—A person had been convicted of a capital felony, and had had a conditional pardon on his being imprisoned for two years. He was entitled to certain copyhold property, which was forfeited to the lord of the manor by virtue of the judgment, provided the lord had entered. The lord did not enter before the expiration of the two years, and the question arose—Was he entitled to enter after the expiration of the two years? This was met by the argument that, as a felon, the man was incapable of holding land, and that that incapacity had not been removed. It was held that the effect of the conditional pardon being the same as a pardon under the Great Seal, and the condition having been performed, the man had been pardoned, and was re-instated in all his rights. The Act of 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 28 was to a similar purpose, "benefit of clergy" having been then abolished; these statutes were followed by 9 Geo. IV. c. 32, which, in the 13th section, enacted that when any person who had been convicted of any felony not punishable by death had endured his punishment, that should have the same effect as a pardon under the Great Seal. In order, therefore, for an offender to be relieved from the disabilities incident to his offence, he must obtain either a pardon under the Great Seal, or a conditional pardon under the Sign Manual, or must endure the punishment. What, therefore, is the position of John Mitchel? I think there is a disqualification in his case, because he has not received a pardon under the Great Seal, nor a pardon under the Sign Manual upon a condition performed, nor has he endured the punishment to which he was sentenced. My hon. and learned Friend (Sir Henry James) has suggested this distinction between the case of O'Donovan Rossa and the case we are now dealing with, that O'Donovan Rossa was at the time actually in prison. No doubt that circumstance was referred to by one or two speakers in the debate on the case of O'Donovan Rossa, but that was not the ground on which the decision of the House was given. The decision of the House in that case was grounded upon the fact that he was a felon who had not cleared himself of the consequences of his felony; and I apprehend that the same principle must apply to the present case—namely, that, having had sentence passed upon him, and having neither received pardon nor endured the punishment to which he was sentenced, Mr. John Mitchel is disqualified from being elected or returned as a Member of this House.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he wished his hon. and learned Friend

The Attorney General

the Attorney General had succeeded more completely to remove the doubts which, in common with his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Taunton, had passed through his own mind. He entirely felt with his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General that this matter had come somewhat suddenly upon the House. He, for one, did not feel in a position to express a confident opinion upon the question, which was of great constitutional importance; and he was sure that those who had most studied it would be most disposed to admit it was a question of enormous difficulty. Now, he would put it to lay Members of the House, whether the statement of the Attorney General had not taken many of them by surprise? ["No, no!" "Hear, hear!"] Gentlemen said "No, no," very hastily; but did they know when they came to the House that John Mitchel could not be remitted to his original punishment? If they did know that they knew a great deal more than some of their instructors in the public Press. Did they know that Mr. Mitchel could not be proceeded against either for having broken his parole or for having escaped from prison? Was not that so generally believed that the Government had been charged with a dereliction from duty for not having arrested him? Therefore did not that show that there was existing in the public mind a very grave misapprehension of the real bearing of this question? The answer which the Attorney General had given in reply to the inquiries of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Taunton were very important. Here was the fact of a convicted felon who was sentenced for a certain number of years, and who was found again in Her Majesty's dominions not having endured his sentence. Why was he not sent back to prison to undergo the residue of his sentence? The answer which every lawyer would give you was, because his sentence was exhausted. There could in reason be no other than that conclusion. If the offence which John Mitchel committed in breaking his parole and escaping from Australia had been committed by any person convicted in England, he thought his hon. and learned Friend would agree with him that he might have been proceeded against under the 5 Geo. IV., c. 84, for "having been found at large in a part of Her Majesty's dominions—namely, Australia—not having undergone the full term of the sentence of transportation." Originally that was a capital offence; but by an Act 4 & 5 Will. IV., it was commuted to transportation for life with certain terms of previous imprisonment. The fact that a person was liable to an indictment for felony did not disqualify him from taking a seat in that House. In fact, it had been decided by the Law of Parliament that a person actually under an indictment for felony was not under disability—he could sit until conviction and judgment. Well, they had this state of things—they had a felon under sentence whose term of sentence had expired, and the mere fact that he could not be imprisoned under that sentence was a circumstance which it was impossible to overlook. His hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General had stated that felony was indelible in its character, except under three processes which he named:—first of all by pardon under the Great Seal; or, secondly, by pardon under the Sign Manual; or, thirdly, by an endurance of the punishment; for which he relied on the 9 Geo. IV., c. 32. He bowed with great deference to the opinion of the Attorney General; but for himself he had looked for authorities upon the proposition, but he had not been able to find one. He was not prepared to say that the proposition was not true, but he should like very much to be satisfied on that point. At the time of all those cases under former statutes to which his hon. and learned Friend had referred, and in which the Sign Manual was sought for a removal of the disability of felony, the doctrine of attainder was in force, because the felonies were capital and attainder followed. Now, as he (Sir William Harcourt) understood the matter, until the case of O'Donovan Rossa there was no authority for stating that any offence whatsoever, except one which was of a capital character, and on which of course attainder followed, constituted a disability for a seat in the House. He believed there was no such authority to be found in the case of O'Donovan Rossa. Well, what did the House do in the case of O'Donovan Rossa? It came to the conclusion—he thought a very reasonable and sound conclusion—that, though attainder had ceased in consequence of the mitigation of the penalty, yet they would apply the disability which had formerly ensued from attainder to cases like that of O'Donovan Rossa where the sentence was still in force and where the felon was still undergoing the penalty: and they therefore declared that O'Donovan Rossa was disqualified from sitting in that House. But now the House was asked to go a step further. He would not express any opinion upon the question whether it ought to go that step further, but he wished the House to understand that this was a new course—that this was an extension of the case of O'Donovan Rossa. He had no desire to express any opinion that they ought not to come to the conclusion that an escaped convict, whose sentence was spent and who could not therefore be further imprisoned, ought not to take advantage of his own wrong, and that therefore they should establish a rule in extension of the old one applying to such cases as the present. He would give no opinion on the subject, but he wished to have time to consider it. They were about to establish a new precedent or extend an old one. That was a question of grave importance. The precedent was one which, if it was to have authority and weight in the future, would have surely more authority in the present, and more weight in the future if it appeared that the House had come to it after due deliberation upon all that might be said on the one side or the other. His hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General relied very much upon the 9 Geo. IV. as a third method of extinguishing the consequences of felony in addition to those that formerly existed by pardon under the Great Seal, or a conditional pardon under the Sign Manual. In his (Sir William Harcourt's) view the Act had no such operation. It was an Act for amending the Law of Evidence in certain cases, and in the midst of the Act, in the third section, was this provision—

“Whereas it is expedient to prevent all doubts respecting the civil rights of persons convicted of felony, not capital, who have undergone the punishment for which they were adjudged, be it therefore enacted that where any offender has been or shall be convicted of any felony not punishable with death, and has endured, or shall endure punishment, the punishment so endured shall have the like effects and consequences of pardon under the Great Seal.”

that taken by the Attorney General, which was that that Act created a new remedy in cases of felony. On the contrary, it seemed to him—though he did not desire to express a positive opinion—that it declared merely what had always existed. He did not desire to express an opinion upon either the law or the policy of this question, but he thought, after listening to the speech of his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General, that even professional persons might hold the opinion that this was a matter into which the House would do well to inquire. For himself, he desired to express no opinion either on the law or the policy of the question, but he must point out that certain points connected with it were well deserving of consideration. He wished his hon. and learned Friend had answered more explicitly the questions put by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Taunton. The House must have been taken by surprise when it learnt that there was no punishment applicable in the present case. His hon. and learned Friend had asked what disability attached to this convicted felon, except the disability it was proposed to apply to him by vote of the House? He wanted a more explicit answer to this question than had been given by the hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General. The House had been told that Mr. Mitchel was under no statutory liability to punishment. It was said, however, that the taint of felony was indelible and must be endured for ever unless a pardon were granted or the sentence endured. Now, in this case the sentence could not be endured because the term of the sentence had expired; therefore there remained nothing except a pardon under the Great Seal. Well, if a convict felon, not having served his term, were subject to no other disability than what this House were about to inflict, he should like to hear the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown on the subject of forfeitures, which, according to Blackstone and other authorities, were the great test of felony. He should like to hear from his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General whether he was prepared to inform the House that after the expiration of the period of the sentence forfeiture in respect of property applied as much as it would if the sentence were still current. This was a very important matter on which he would not offer an opinion. Lawyers entertained grave doubts whether these forfeitures could be applied in cases where the term of the sentence had expired. If his hon. and learned Friend was not prepared to say that the civil penalty still remained, the House would be called upon to pronounce a disability in the case of a person who was subject to no other disability. This unquestionably would be extending the law of disability very much beyond its present limits. Again, if the House decided by a vote to-night on the very imperfect information now before it, that Mr. Mitchel was disabled, it might happen, as had happened before, that the person declared to be disabled would be re-elected; and it might also happen that some other person would set up a claim to the seat after having given notice that the other candidate was disabled. In such a case the latter might petition for the seat, and the matter would be referred to the Judges, who might hold one opinion respecting disabilities while the House of Commons held another. This was a position in which the House ought not to be in a hurry to place itself. This was a danger which he thought hon. Members ought to take into consideration before they determined a question which was not one of opinion, sentiment, or policy, such as arose in the case of expulsion, but was a question of legality, and the House might get engaged in one of those dangerous conflicts with the Courts of Law out of which the House of Commons had not always come with the greatest advantage. If a Committee were appointed what inconvenience could arise? Its members would be persons of the greatest experience and learning in the House, who would be perfectly competent to consider all the matters brought before them. A Committee would have the advantage of the learning and authority of his hon. and learned Friends the Law Officers of England and Ireland, who, after mature deliberation, would advise the House as to the course it ought to pursue. If, therefore, there were room for any reasonable doubt—he did not say a preponderance of opinion, because that was not necessary—it appeared to him that the House would take a course consistent with its former practice and its dignity, and one which would give satisfaction to those who, whatever the decision might be, would bow to it the more readily when they considered that it was not a hasty decision, but the result of due and calm consideration.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, that notwithstanding he entertained the highest respect for his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Oxford, he must confess his hon. and learned Friend had failed to raise the slightest doubt in his mind on this question. At the outset he would remark that the question before the House was whether John Mitchel, being a convicted felon, was eligible to sit in the House of Commons? The question was not whether John Mitchel could be remitted to his punishment or proceeded against for escape, for prison breach, or for anything of the sort. With regard to his being remitted to his punishment, a question might arise under the statute, making it an offence for a man who had been transported or sent into penal servitude to be found at large without reasonable excuse; but in order to decide the matter with which the House had to deal to-night, it was not, in his opinion, in the least degree necessary to solve the question. The question which really arose was perfectly simple, and one upon which no one who had investigated it with an earnest desire to understand it could have not only any reasonable doubt, but any doubt whatever. The Common Law of the land on the subject was laid down in such great storehouses of legal knowledge as Coke's "Institutes," wherein it was stated in the most positive and decisive manner that a man attainted of treason or of felony was incapable of being elected as a Member of Parliament. The ground for that statement of the law was extracted from the writ for the election of a Member of Parliament—not that a person so attainted had become civilly dead, but because he was not "a fit and proper person," within the language of the writ, to serve in Parliament. Nobody, he thought, would dispute the good sense of the Common Law on this subject, for could anyone doubt that a man disgraced and infamous as a convicted felon was, primâ facie, at all events, unfit to sit in that House? This was the ground on which the statement of the law contained in Coke's "Institutes," and other well-known books, was based. Further, they would find it stated that although a man who had been attainted of treason or felony was incapable of sitting in Parliament, that disability might be removed by the pardon of the Sovereign, and his hon. and learned Friend was in error when he supposed that at Common Law, without reference to the statutes he had cited, that disability could not be removed in any other way. An old book of the highest authority on election law, after stating that attainder of treason or felony disqualified men from sitting as Members of Parliament, went on to say—

“But if they have received a pardon under the Great Seal, or had the benefit of the clergy, or undergone the punishment of their offence, they are not ineligible unless the House declare them to be so by express resolution to that effect.”

There they had a distinct statement of the law on the subject. A doubt at one time arose as to whether a person who was not attainted for treason or felony, but was merely convicted, was disqualified. An attainder attached solely upon sentence of death being passed, and it was urged at one time, with some show of plausibility, that if the person who sought to qualify himself as a Member had not been sentenced, and had not been attainted, but merely convicted, he was not disqualified, because he did not come within the precise language of the authorities upon the subject. But that point, although it was capable of argument, had been decided in two cases which had been before the House. The first case was when a Resolution was brought forward in the House to the effect that Mr. Smith O'Brien having been “convicted” of felony, he was ineligible to sit in the House. There was an Amendment proposed that the Resolution should run that he had been “attainted.” The Amendment was rejected, and the original Resolution agreed to, that, having been adjudged guilty—which was simply convicted—of felony, he was ineligible to sit in the House. They then came to another authority in 1870, when the point was expressly decided in the case of O'Donovan Rossa. O'Donovan Rossa had been convicted under the very statute upon which John Mitchel was convicted, and the question was whether, not having been sentenced to death, and the offence not being in fact punishable by death, he was or was not eligible to sit in Parliament; and after full and ample discussion it was decided that, having been convicted and being still under sentence, he was disqualified to sit in Parliament. There could be no doubt, therefore, upon the question that conviction was disqualification in the present day. He came, then, to the question whether anything had happened in this case which had restored the qualification lost by John Mitchel through his conviction for felony. Even at Common Law nothing could restore that qualification except a pardon under the Great Seal, or what was equivalent to a pardon. Some two or three things were equivalent to a pardon. The Act 7 & 8 Geo. IV., c. 28, made the discharge of an offender from custody in the case of a free pardon, and the performance of the condition in the case of a conditional pardon, to have the effect of a pardon under the Great Seal. Then came the Act 9 Geo. IV. His hon. and learned Friend (Sir Henry James) seemed to think that this statute referred simply to the removal of the incapacity previously imposed upon a man convicted of felony, in giving evidence. The recital of the Act, however, declared that it was—

and then it went on to enact that when an offender had been convicted of felony not punishable by death, and had endured the punishment, the like effect and consequences of a pardon would thereby be produced. The hon. and learned Member for Oxford asked what would be the consequence as regarded the forfeiture of land. This point had been decided; and, if he might be pardoned for quoting a Law Report in such an Assembly, he would refer to the case of “Evans v. Evans” in 5 Barneswall and Cresswell. In that case a man had been convicted of a capital offence; his sentence had been commuted to imprisonment for two years, and he had undergone that imprisonment; yet it was held that his status was not revived because he had undergone the imprisonment, but simply because he had received a pardon under the Great Seal. This case showed clearly, he thought, what would be the consequence with regard to forfeiture or any other offence, if a person did not endure his imprisonment. What would be the logical result of the arguments on the other side? It was maintained that if a man, who was convicted and transported under his sentence, afterwards escaped, either by violence, or without violence, he had in fact endured his sentence, or what was equivalent to his sentence. [Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT: No—I never used that argument.] At all events, it was said that if the term of the sentence had expired, as in this case, the offender's qualification was restored, and he was entitled to sit as a Member of this House. It seemed to him that if that argument were pushed to its legitimate conclusion, any ticket-of-leave man might be elected and sit in this House. It would hardly be consistent with the honour and dignity of this House that a ticket-of-leave man should have a right to sit among its Members. In 1819 a question arose as to the effect of a sentence of transportation, and it was contended that, under a statute which said that transportation should have the same effect as a pardon had, the effect of a pardon was produced simply because the offender was sent out of the kingdom. It was decided, moreover, that the words of the Act could only be satisfied by the offender remaining the term for which he was transported. Reference had been made to the statute of 1870. This was an Act for abolishing forfeitures for treason and felony. It provided that in such cases corruption in blood and all similar disabilities should be done away with; but, in order that the principle of the law might be retained, there was a distinct enactment that persons convicted under the Act, until they had suffered the punishment adjudged or received a free pardon, should be incapable of holding various offices, or of exercising the Parliamentary or municipal franchise. It seemed to him that the law with reference to such offenders after the passing of this Act was what the law was with reference to such offenders before. In conclusion, he submitted that the case was perfectly plain. John Mitchel having been convicted of felony, not having received a pardon, and not having done anything equivalent to a pardon, remained disqualified to sit in that House.

MR. LOWE: I think there are two things upon which we shall all agree. One is that this is a case of immense importance. The other is that, after hearing the learned arguments which have been addressed to the House, it is a case of no inconsiderable difficulty. We can have no other wish than to do what is according to the law and custom of Parliament, and act with the most scrupulous justice and fairness in this matter. It is not because there are certain features in the case which may excite our feelings that we are to be hasty or precipitate, or lay ourselves hereafter open to the charge that we have not given this matter all the consideration it deserves. I would not presume to enter into the great legal controversy which has arisen; but if we act as we are asked to act—without further deliberation—we shall show certain signs of a haste which I should very much deprecate. Let me first refer to the terms of the right hon. Gentleman's Motion. He asks us to say—

"That John Mitchel, returned as Member for the County of Tipperary, having been adjudged guilty of felony, and sentenced to transportation for fourteen years, and not having endured the punishment to which he was adjudged for such felony, or received a pardon under the Great Seal, has become, and continues, incapable of being elected or returned as a Member of this House."

The Motion is pregnant with these two admissions—first, that it is not sufficient for John Mitchel to have been guilty of felony, because other circumstances are added to make out the case; the second is that he has not endured the punishment to which he was adjudged. It is quite clear, therefore, that in the minds of the framers of the Resolution, this point is essential, as also that Mitchel has not received a pardon under the Great Seal. These are the views of the Government as they are embodied in their Resolution, and when the Attorney General rose in answer to a question distinctly put to him, whether Mr. Mitchel could be re-captured, and made to undergo the remainder of his sentence, he certainly replied in the negative; and he attached very considerable weight to that fact, as forming a strong part of the case against Mr. Mitchel. But when the Solicitor General came to speak, that hon. and learned Gentleman took an entirely different view of the matter, and laid it down distinctly that the mere fact of Mr. Mitchel having suffered a conviction for felony, whether the sentence had been enforced or not, was for all times a disqualification for sitting in this House. ["No, no!"] That is what I understood the hon. and learned Gentleman to say, and he in no way qualified the words he used, although he may have had some qualification of them in his mind at the time he uttered them. Under these circumstances, there being this difference of opinion on the part of the Attorney and the Solicitor General, in my view we ought not to rush precipitately to a decision upon this question. Two precedents have been cited as authorities which ought to guide us in determining this case. The first of those precedents was the case of Mr. Smith O'Brien; but few hon. Members, after what they have heard with respect to that case, would like to give an opinion as to whether the fact of Mr. Smith O'Brien's attainder did or did not deprive the precedent of all value in the present case, Mr. Mitchel not having been attainted. The second precedent cited was the case of O'Donovan Rossa; but that case cannot be followed as a precedent, because O'Donovan Rossa, at the time of his election, was a criminal undergoing his sentence, and if we had held that he was able to sit in this House, we should, of course, have implied that he must fulfil his duties as a Member, and therefore we should have been compelled to hold that the mere fact of a man being elected operated as a pardon for felony. It is clear, therefore, that we have not any case which is exactly in point, and we have a difference of opinion among the legal Advisers of the Government. Therefore, without the least wish to shield Mr. Mitchel from the consequences of his conduct, and desiring that the very strictest and, if you please, the very sternest justice should be shown to this man, I must express my opinion that the House would act not unwisely if they were to appoint a Committee to look carefully into these statutes. No great injury would result from the short delay that the adoption of such a course would occasion; while—if we were to act with undue haste in the matter—we might do that which would be injurious to our dignity, and would bring about political consequences which we should all be most anxious to avoid. Having a strong conviction on the subject, I feel it to be my duty to solicit the attention of Her Majesty's Government to my proposal, and to ask them whether—considering how short a delay the course I have pointed out would lead to—the great complexity of the points involved, the recent alterations in the law, the difficulty of saying how far to go and when to stop, and the differences of opinion among the legal Advisers of the Government, it would not be better for them to refrain from pressing this question to a decision to-night?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Sir, I quite agree with the right hon. Gentleman who has just spoken that it is the duty of the House in such a case as this not to proceed without being certain of the course they are taking; and it is because Her Majesty's Government do feel that they are taking a right course, and that time is of the essence of the matter, that they venture to press upon the House that they should proceed to a decision upon this occasion. I might mention to the House many difficulties that might immediately arise if this matter were not at once disposed of. For instance, it might happen that Mr. Mitchel might appear at this Table to be sworn, and might be sworn, so far as you, Mr. Speaker, are concerned, by the fact of his coming to the Table with his return in his hand, at the very time when we were deliberating whether he should be sworn or not. I only put that as one ground why it is very desirable that we should come to a conclusion at once. With respect to the duty which we all have with regard to Mr. Mitchel, or to any other person whose seat in this House is in question, I quite admit, with the right hon. Gentleman opposite, that the matter ought to be adjudged judicially; and there is no object on the part of Her Majesty's Government to proceed against Mr. Mitchel, or any other persons specially, except in regard to the position in which they have placed themselves. I have observed throughout this debate that the right hon. and hon. and learned Members opposite have spoken, not with certainty, or endeavouring in any way to guide the House to a conclusion, but simply on the question of time, because they say that they cannot make up their minds with regard to it. On the other hand, my hon. and learned Friends who have spoken on this side of the House, after having given their greatest attention to the case, have stated their legal opinion upon this case, and have told the House that Mr. Mitchel is in such a position that the Government must feel bound to call upon the House to act in accordance with precedents upon which it has acted heretofore, and come to a decision on this question. The question as to whether Mr. Mitchel could be re-captured is entirely beside the matter. The simple and the sole point upon which my hon. and learned Friends have relied is that Mr. Mitchel was made a felon by the conviction and judgment which was passed on him; that he has never rehabilitated himself; and that he is at this moment and remains as much a felon as he was when that sentence was passed upon him. There is no way of avoiding that effect of a conviction except, as has been pointed out by my hon. and learned Friends, by a pardon under the Great Seal, or by the fulfilment of the sentence; and we know perfectly well that Mr. Mitchel has neither obtained a pardon nor worked out his sentence. That being so, the right hon. Gentleman opposite says that there are differences of opinion on this question between the Attorney General and the Solicitor General. There is no such difference of opinion on their part at all. The Solicitor General alleged that the disqualification continued to exist, and could only be purged away by the means he expressed to the House, which was exactly what the Attorney General had previously stated to us. In what position are we with regard to Mr. Mitchel? We proceeded to deal with O'Donovan Rossa, not upon the ground that he was in prison—although the fact that he was in prison was mentioned at the time—but because he was a convicted felon.

MR. LOWE: The fact that he was in prison was mentioned in the Resolution.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: I know that; but every one can see that the argument proceeded upon the fact, not that he was in prison, but that he was a convicted felon. Then with regard to Smith O'Brien. The right hon. Gentleman opposite says that we proceeded in the case of Smith O'Brien because he was attainted. Now, that point was taken at the time and was argued, and in the discussion upon the election of O'Donovan Rossa, the Solicitor General of the day (Sir John Coleridge) showed what was done with regard to that point in the case of Smith O'Brien. He quoted the opinion of Sir John Jervis, one of the greatest criminal lawyers of the day, and a man whose acuteness on all subjects this House may thoroughly depend upon. Sir John Jervis said—

"Don't put in 'attainted;' there are many felonies on which attainer at this time of day does not follow; if you put in 'attainted' you will be yielding to the argument of Sir Frederick Thesiger, that it is upon attainer, and technical attainer alone, that a man becomes ineligible. I would do nothing of the sort. I recommend the House of Commons to say that what really makes a man ineligible is the conviction and the judgment on conviction."—[3 Hansard, cxlix. 141.]

That is a plain, simple, intelligible proposition. In this case there has been a conviction and judgment, and the criminal, when transported, made his escape without working out his sentence. Mr. Mitchel therefore remains a felon; and, in the discharge of their duty to this House and to the country, Her Majesty's Government call upon the House to say that John Mitchel is not qualified to be duly elected.

MR. JOHN MARTIN said, he had no idea of continuing the legal argument even as an amateur. What he wanted to say was suggested by a remark of the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt). He spoke of its being possible to proceed against Mr. Mitchel for breaking his parole. That was a question in which he (Mr. Martin) entertained a different, and a much deeper feeling than was involved in the mere legal question. That might be settled as the majority of the lawyers might think fit, and as the House might think fit; but the question of Mr. Mitchel breaking his parole was a question of honour that concerned and compromised him (Mr. Martin), and upon which, therefore, he wished to say a few words to the House. When his friend (Mr. P. J. Smyth), who subsequently assisted Mr. Mitchel to escape, came over from America to Van Dieman's Land to consult with Mr. Mitchel and his friends, the scheme which they proposed to adopt was laid in full detail before Mr. Mitchel's three comrades—he meant the three convicted felons—one of whom was a traitor, and the other two were what the House called traitor-felons. He (Mr. Martin) was one of the felons. The scheme, in full detail, was laid by Mr. Mitchel before the late Mr. Smith O'Brien, Dr. O'Doherty, now in Queensland, and himself (Mr. Martin). Each of them was requested by Mr. Mitchel to consider the details of the scheme which it was proposed to adopt, and to tell him, upon their honour, considering the ticket-of-leave, and the "comparative liberty" which he enjoyed, and considering his parole, and the entire circumstances, whether escape by this means would be honourable or not. Each of them considered it with the conscientiousness of honourable men, and some of them gave their opinions in writing that escape effected by such means would be honourable, and in no respect violate the obligations of his parole. [Laughter.] Well, that was his opinion, and he valued that laugh for no more than it was worth. Some of the leading London journals had tried to compliment him as an honourable man at the expense of his friend Mr. Mitchel, but his object now was to tell every hon. Member of that House—and through that House the London Press—that if Mr. Mitchel had violated his honour, he (Mr. Martin) was responsible for Mr. Mitchel's conduct. He knew that his friend Mr. Mitchel, however he might have offended that House and the English nation, had never told a lie, and had never violated his honour. He knew that. He (John Martin), Member for Meath, who was called honourable by courtesy in that House, and who valued his honour above all other kind of reputation, declared that if John Mitchel broke his parole, he (Mr. Martin) broke his. For the decision to which the House might come he cared little, nor did he think that Mr. Mitchel cared much. He had been elected unopposed and in his absence for Tipperary, and he was the real Representative of that county, no matter how the House might decide. He was sorry to be unable to sit down without referring to the display of unamiable spirit which characterised the London Press, English literature generally, and even some Members of that House, and which led them to think that any man who was their enemy must therefore be stigmatised as a rascal and a blackguard. He thought that was a mistake. It was not chivalrous, generous, or virtuous.

MR. WHITBREAD, as a layman, had arrived at a pretty clear conviction as to what ought to be done in the present case. He certainly did not think that it would be possible, or, if possible, practicable, to arrest Mr. Mitchel and remit him to prison for that portion of his sentence which he had not endured. They could not, in his view, treat Mr. Mitchel with any greater severity than they would any other ticket-of-leave man who had broken the conditions of his ticket; and looking to the history of the Acts which had been referred to, and to the practice with regard to the forfeiture of licences, he could not recommend Her Majesty's Government to act in that way. Indeed, if they turned to the very latest Act upon the subject, they would see in what way it dealt with the forfeiture of licences. Any action taken against the convict must be taken during the term of his sentence. If the convict broke one of the conditions of his licence he might be arrested and sent back to prison until his sentence expired. If he were summarily convicted of any offence during the currency of the ticket-of-leave, then, in addition to punishment to which he was liable for the offence, he could be sent back to penal servitude for the period of his sentence unexpired at that time; but when his sentence was over they could not touch him on account of his having broken any of the conditions of his licence. He was clearly of opinion that no action could be taken against Mr. Mitchel on that ground. On the other ground, however, his mind was perfectly clear that the action of the Government was the right one. The Act of 9 Geo. IV., c. 33, s. 3, had been very often referred to, and he wished to notice one remark in connection with that Act which was made by his hon. and learned Friend (Sir Henry James), who said that the 3rd section only applied to disability to give evidence, because it was in the Evidence Act. If, however, his hon. and learned Friend had searched a little further he would have found there was another Act passed in the same year for Improving the Administration of Justice in Criminal Cases in Ireland, and that in that Act the same clauses were repeated with this exception—that the second Act applied to cases of felony whether punishable by death or not. That Act declared that if a convict, when he had a conditional pardon given him, fulfilled the conditions of that conditional pardon, he was then in the same position as if he had received a pardon under the Great Seal. The Act did not apply to disability to give evidence merely, but was declaratory as to the removal of other disabilities. The case, therefore, to his mind, as a layman, seemed a very simple one. Mr. Mitchel having been convicted of felony, had lost his civil rights and had incurred certain disabilities, one of which certainly was — as the House in a recent case had already decided—inability to be elected and to sit as a Member of that House. A wise and merciful law had declared that there was a way in which he could purge himself of those disabilities and become restored to his full civil rights. He had not chosen to fulfil these necessary conditions, and therefore to his (Mr. Whitbread's) mind it was clear that he still remained under the disability. But grave doubts had been expressed upon this subject by hon. and learned Gentlemen whose opinions were entitled to great weight in that House. Some hon. Members thought that Her Majesty's Government could take upon themselves the responsibility of the step now proposed, but he did not. He did not think the Government could relieve the House from the full responsibility of the course they might take that night. The speech of Her Majesty's Attorney General had not, he thought, given them full confidence that the question had been fully considered; and therefore, though he did not himself entertain any doubt that the action proposed by the Government was the right one, yet seeing that the vote of the House would not be like a vote upon a Bill which could be re-considered, but that if they declared Mr. Mitchel ineligible their decision would be final and irrevocable, there was, he thought, considerable ground for the suggestion that the matter should be referred to a Select Committee. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gathorne Hardy) said there were grave objections to the adoption of that course, because Mr. Mitchel might come and demand to be sworn at the Table; but he (Mr. Whitbread) could not doubt that it was within the province of the House to prevent any such step being taken, and to come to a Resolution that Mr. Mitchel should not take his seat until the Committee of Inquiry had reported. If that were the case, then the only objection to a short delay had vanished, and he thought it would be more for the dignity and reputation of the House if, instead of coming to a decision now, they should grant the time which had been asked; and he certainly felt that no evil would result from the adoption of such a course.

MR. LOPES expressed his entire concurrence in the opinions expressed by his hon. and learned Friends the Law Officers of the Crown. And it was satisfactory to have those opinions so signally confirmed by the opinion of the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down. For his part, he should be most reluctant to differ from his hon. and learned Friends the Members for Taunton and Oxford (Sir Henry James and Sir William Harcourt), but they had candidly admitted that they had not had sufficient time to look fully into the question. The matter, indeed, lay in a very small compass. The facts were few, and the principle of law which governed the case was distinct and clear. It was not disputed that Mr. Mitchel had been convicted of felony, neither was it questioned that a convicted felon could not sit in the House. It was admitted that there were certain ways by which Mr. Mitchel could purge that incapacity — one was by Royal pardon, which he had not received, another by enduring his sentence under the Act of George IV. His hon. and learned Friend the Member for Taunton seemed to entertain some doubt whether that Act applied to disqualification of the kind in question; but in that view he could not concur; but if the hon. Member for Taunton was right, and a convicted felon could not be rehabilitated under that Act, it followed that nothing but a Royal Pardon would have any effect in restoring him to his civil rights. The sole question was, had Mr. Mitchel got rid of the felony of which he had been convicted? If he had not—and he was clearly of opinion that he had not—the ineligibility which it entailed remained. He submitted that the course for the House to take was perfectly clear, and that the case was on all fours with that of Mr. Rossa, the only distinction being that Mr. Rossa was at the time in prison, and that the sentence had not expired. Was it to be said that Mr. Mitchel, having eluded the vigilance of the law, was to be considered in the position in which he would have stood if he had endured his sentence? He submitted that he was placed in a different position, and trusted that the House would adopt the course proposed by Her Majesty's Government.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: It is hardly necessary to assure the House that anything I may say or that has been said by my hon. Friends on this Bench is not influenced by a desire either to see Mr. Mitchel a Member of this House or to see him excluded from it. To us, on political grounds, the way in which the matter may be settled is one of perfect indifference. I believe there are only one or two Members of the House with whom Mr. Mitchel would find himself in common agreement. On the other hand, I cannot think that the position of Mr. Mitchel differs so very much from that of other Members who sit in this House—that the dignity of the House would very greatly suffer from his presence. The only considerations by which we are moved are, on the one hand, the consideration whether it is due to the dignity of the House—seeing the peculiar position in which Mr. Mitchel is placed by his sentence and by his subsequent escape—that the same action should be taken in his case as was taken in the case of O'Donovan Rossa; and, on the other hand, we are influenced by the desire that the House should discuss the question on strictly legal grounds and should not import into it anything of a moral or political character. The House will not expect that I should follow the extremely intricate and technical argument which has been addressed to it on both sides. What is pretty plain is that the action of the Government was founded almost entirely, if not entirely, on the precedent in the case of O'Donovan Rossa in 1870. The hon. and learned Member who spoke last said that the case was on all-fours with that precedent. Now, I may point out to the House that the present case is not on all-fours with that of O'Donovan Rossa, because the Resolution which the House agreed to in that case stated—and it is not irrelevant to the point at issue—that O'Donovan Rossa “is now in prison and undergoing his sentence, and therefore incapable of attending the sittings of the House.” The Government did not make that statement in the present case, because they are unable to do so; and therefore it is impossible to say that the precedent is altogether on all-fours with the present case. If I had no other reason to doubt the present case being on all-fours with that of O'Donovan Rossa I should be satisfied with the statement of the Attorney General. He said that the House had disqualified Rossa, not because he was in prison and unable to attend the sittings of the House, but “because he was a felon who had not purged himself of the consequences of his felony”—and he stated that Mr. Mitchel was in the same position. Now, there lies the whole question, and I am not convinced by the arguments I have heard on the other side. What the House requires distinctly to know is, whether Mr. Mitchel is “a felon not purged from the consequences of his felony.” I will not say that it is not true, but it has not been proved to the House; and if the House should accept that as a true conclusion, it would carry very extraordinary consequences with it. In the ordinary case of a felon not purged from the consequences of his felony it might be supposed that he was liable to something more than a disqualification to sit in Parliament. He would be liable to punishment. And this, of all the felons I ever heard of, is the only felon who, in the words of the Attorney General, cannot be proceeded against and prosecuted for breaking prison. The argument of the Attorney General is that he has committed a felony—that he has not purged himself from the consequences of that felony, and yet that he cannot be punished for that felony, although he is still under disqualification. That may be so; but it is a very extraordinary and unprecedented state of things. Other considerations have been urged which have led me to conclude that the case is not so absolutely clear as to induce the House at once to act upon it. Those who have read the debate in the case of O'Donovan Rossa will remember that very great stress was laid, and that the whole case was argued, upon the question whether he was legally disqualified or not. The House was not invited to consider whether Rossa was morally disqualified. I will not say for a moment whether Mr. Mitchel is morally disqualified or not. What the House is invited to consider is whether he is legally qualified or disqualified, and the matter is not so free from doubt as some hon. Members imagine. With regard to the argument of the Secretary for War, if we suppose for a moment that Mr. Mitchel, pending the deliberations of a Committee of this House, were to take his seat as a Member, that would be a much less misfortune than if by any accident or undue precipitation the House should arrive at a wrong conclusion. I trust that, under the circumstances, the Government will not think it unworthy of them to appoint a Committee. If they do not, and the House proceeds to a division, although I should prefer, for the reasons I have given, that the matter should be referred to a Select Committee, I shall have no difficulty in voting with the hon. Member (Mr. O'Shaughnessy) in favour of the adjournment. If the House would allow that Motion to be withdrawn, and if another Motion were substituted for it—namely, the appointment of a Committee—it seems to me that the issue would be raised in a fairer manner.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. PLUNKET) said, he must claim the indulgence of the House for a few observations which he, as an Irish Law Officer, was called upon to make—because the most important and solemn part of the speech of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) was when he asked what was the state of affairs as regarded John Mitchel's legal position in Ireland, and whether the Government were prepared to prosecute him. He wanted to know, in fact, what the Government were prepared to do in the way of taking criminal action against Mitchel; and, if they were not prepared to do so, whether they could justify the present proceeding, and ask the House to inflict upon him this very serious penalty. They—the Government—had considered the subject carefully, and they did not think that proceedings could be taken against Mitchel. And for these reasons. It had been already explained that the Irish statute relating to persons at large before the termination of their sentence did not cover the case of an offender who was found at large in any part of Her Majesty's dominions outside the United Kingdom; and, therefore, the Government could not proceed against Mitchel on that ground, he having been convicted in Ireland. Nor could they indict him for prison-breach, because there was no actual force employed; nor yet as regarded the smaller offence of an escape could he be arrested in this country. That being the case, they were asked how the Government ventured to come to the House and represent to it that Mitchel was unfit to be elected a Member to represent the county of Tipperary. The simple answer was set out on the face of the Papers laid before the House—namely, that he was a felon adjudged guilty of felony, whose disability had not been removed in either of two ways—either by obtaining a pardon from the Crown or by enduring the punishment recorded against him. There had, in truth, been only two questions raised which seemed to throw doubt upon the Resolutions that the Government had put upon the Paper. The first was the question raised by his hon. and learned Friend the junior Member for Limerick (Mr. O'Shaughnessy), who did not so much raise it as his own objection as on account of the letter written by his Colleague, the senior Member for Limerick (Mr. Isaac Butt), which appeared in that morning's journals. Now any suggestion which was made by the hon. and learned Member for Limerick on such a point of law was entitled to the utmost consideration, and the House would therefore, perhaps, allow him to explain why, in his opinion, it need not pause in the course which the Government invited it to take, because of that difficulty. What the hon. and learned Member for Limerick suggested was that it might at least be fairly argued that notwithstanding Mr. Mitchel's escape he had endured the sentence of transportation. The hon. and learned Gentleman went on to say that so far as he had been able to learn such a sentence originally amounted to nothing more than mere banishment out of the country for the period mentioned. But if that were so, on what authority, he should like to know, had Mr. Mitchel been detained in Van Diemen's Land? It was quite plain it must have been under an adjudication of some kind; and as there was but one adjudication against him, it must have been under that; therefore, unless his detention was perfectly illegal, he had entirely disposed, he contended, of the argument of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick. But the hon. and learned Gentleman added—to make regulations respecting transported persons; but, unless submission to the regulations was made a portion of the sentence, it meant nothing more than being carried beyond seas and remaining beyond seas for its term."

Well, submission to the regulations might not be made portion of the sentence by the words of a Judge; but it was so made by the words of the statutes. The English statute was to the effect that every offender sentenced to transportation beyond the seas should be subject to the provisions of the Act; and those provisions were such as to enable the colonial Governor to apply to him the required discipline and to keep him in custody. Then another Act extended the English statute to Ireland, and went on to provide that it should be lawful for the Secretary of State to order the removal of a person so sentenced to transportation to the Colonies, and that being so removed he should be subject to like supervision and control as that which was prescribed by the former Act. Those two statutes must, he maintained, be read side by side with that which enabled the Court in Dublin to pronounce the adjudication against Mr. Mitchel, and, being so read, his sentence could not be said to have been endured, for it was quite impossible fairly to maintain that transportation under such circumstances meant nothing more than mere banishment. Again, a difficulty had been hinted by the hon. and learned Member for Oxford, who, having given proofs of that learning and research which he always displayed, ended by expressing no opinion of his own, nor did he assert any positive doubt as to the justice of the proposal which was made by the Government; and had, he (Mr. Plunket) would ask, any good reason been shown by any hon. Member why the House of Commons should stop in this great constitutional proceeding, and should not at once follow the precedents upon which it had always acted when it declared that a felon who had not expiated his crime or suffered his allotted punishment should not be permitted to come there as one of its Members? The case of O'Donovan Rossa was said by some to be not on all-fours with the present, because he was then actually in prison undergoing his sentence; but the Resolution which prevented him from taking his seat set forth that his claim to do so was refused because his sentence was unexpired. It was for the same reason that the House was invited that evening to pursue a similar course. Mr. Mitchel, too, was an unpardoned felon, who had not endured his punishment, and clothed himself again with citizenship, and there was no precedent for allowing such a person to take his seat in the House of Commons. And was there, he would ask, anything in the case of Mr. Mitchel which ought to induce the House to strain a point in his favour? Surely there was not. The noble Marquess opposite, who spoke in a spirit of which it was not for him (Mr. Plunket) to complain, had said that after all there were a good many persons in that Assembly who were not much better than Mitchel. From that statement he must entirely dissent. There was, he believed, no one among them who, having been released on parole, had taken advantage of "the comparative liberty" accorded to him to break that parole, and escape to a foreign land, where he passed his time, until by a technicality he was able to return to his native country to beard a Government which had treated him with great leniency and compassion. He would, however, comment no further on the conduct of Mr. Mitchel in that respect, but would conclude by reading a passage from a speech of a great Statesman to whose words the House always listened with respect, and who knew men well. In 1856, at the conclusion of the peace with Russia, Mr. Duncombe asked the First Lord of the Treasury—

"Whether, in consequence of the numerous memorials presented at different times in favour of a full and free pardon to Messrs. Frost, Williams, Jones, Smith O'Brien, and other political prisoners, whose conduct during exile has been without reproach, it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government, on the celebration of peace, to advise Her Majesty to comply with the prayer of those memorials, and thereby enable those exiles to return to their native land?"—

Viscount Palmerston said—

"He must request the indulgence of the House, as it was against rule for him to speak again after moving the adjournment. He had great pleasure in stating to his hon. Friend and to the House, that the announcement which had appeared in the papers this morning was entirely and perfectly true. Her Majesty, following the impulses and dictates of those generous feelings by which she was so eminently distinguished, had determined to take advantage of the return of peace, and of the unexampled loyalty

alty which prevailed from one end of her dominions to the other, to do an act of grace and clemency towards all persons under sentence for political offences, with the exception of those unhappy men who had broken all the ties of honour and fled from their place of banishment."—[Ibid.]

MR. W. E. FORSTER must remind the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just addressed the House that they were not called upon to decide this Motion with reference to the question whether John Mitchel had acted dishonourably or not. It was not on that issue that he thought the hon. and learned Gentleman must himself desire to have it decided. It was just possible there might be hereafter a ground for the expulsion of Mitchel on that account; but surely they ought not to confuse the decision at which they might arrive by introducing that question or exciting the feelings of hon. Members in regard to it. The hon. and learned Gentleman, no doubt, was anxious they should decide purely on the question of law; but he must for himself state that he gave even a wider definition of this desire to act upon purely legal grounds than had yet been given. He did think that when it was a question of disputing the verdict of a large constituency, the benefit of any doubt ought to be given to that constituency. That was the principle which should be applied to all the Three Kingdoms. They should apply it to their own constituencies, and, indeed, it was the only safe principle which Parliament could now follow. But he would go further and say if he had any doubt that this ought to be the principle, the doubt would not apply in this case; for remembering the feelings which, unfortunately, were held by many of their Irish fellow-subjects, he should be exceedingly loth that any Irish constituency, more or less reluctant to join in the British Imperial Parliament, should find that the Member they did send from that constituency should be refused admission on any but the most distinct and decided grounds. He came down to the House, thinking he should have very little difficulty in this matter; but he was very much mistaken if any hon. Member had the same feeling of certainty now that he had before entering the House. There had been difficult legal arguments on both sides, and admissions had been made by hon. and learned Gentlemen which rendered the question by no means so clear. There were three grounds on which it appeared to him John Mitchel might be refused admission to that House. They might be able to state that it was the common law of England that a man in his position should not be a Member of Parliament; or they might say there had been decisions of the House in former cases, according to which he was disqualified; or they might say that because this was a new case, and a case so very clear, they should come to a resolution that he should be excluded. As regarded the first of these grounds, he observed the assertion which had been made by the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (the Solicitor General for Ireland): he said, John Mitchel, being a felon, was adjudged guilty of felony. The Resolution did not say he was a felon. That was the very point on which they were ignorant, and which they wanted to be thoroughly settled—whether John Mitchel was at this moment a felon or not. His hon. and learned Friend the Member for the City of Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) said that the felony was exhausted, and he watched to see what answer the Solicitor General would make to that statement; but he made no reply to it. But he was told John Mitchel was in a position in which he had thought none of Her Majesty's subjects could be—that he was a felon who could not be punished. He confessed he had always thought that a felon was a man who was either undergoing punishment or could be punished the moment he was got hold of. There seemed to be a doubt whether John Mitchel was a felon or not, and at any rate there was a great difference between his case and that of O'Donovan Rossa, for that man was under sentence at the time of his election, and that made it impossible for him to attend to his duties in that House. Then came the question whether, supposing the case to be a new one, the House ought to admit or exclude John Mitchel? But could the House decide that serious question at present? Would not their decision have greater force in Ireland if it were known there that they had come to a fair verdict after receiving the Report of a Select Committee? He would ask the Government to consider for a moment whether their own Resolution would not have greater force if agreed to after a full discussion and deliberation of such a Committee? Her Majesty's Ministers were responsible for the government of the country; but he contended that they would find that government much easier if they should be able to point to the decision of a Select Committee and say that it excluded John Mitchel from being present in that House, instead of asking the House to say that after this hasty discussion. There being a great difference of opinion among hon. and learned Members at present, he considered that there ought to be a Committee composed of those Members whose names would carry the most weight with the country.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, the right hon. Gentleman who has just addressed us, said he came down to this House, and anticipated a very short discussion in consequence of the simplicity of the issue we laid before the House; and then the right hon. Gentleman made a speech, the object of which was to prolong discussion and to postpone decision. He recommends us to refer to a Committee what the House ought to decide itself. And on what ground are these latter sentiments of the right hon. Gentleman so different from the feeling with which he entered the House to-night,—on what ground are they founded? Why, upon the contradictory opinions which have been expressed during this discussion upon the subject before us. I have not heard any contradictory opinions. I have not left the House for a moment. I have listened attentively to every word which has been expressed, and these contrary decisions have not reached my ear. There have been no contrary decisions on this side of the House; and on the other side there have been no decisions at all. One right hon. Gentleman after another has got up to express his inability to come to any conclusion—telling us he could not decide; and the hon. Gentleman—whose opinions will always be received in this House with the respect they deserve—the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread) was the single exception on the other side of the House who did give an opinion—and he gave it in favour of the Resolution of Her Majesty's Government. Some hon. Gentlemen opposite seem to think that we are taking an interest in this case as if all our party feelings were involved in it. I can say for myself no Motion I have ever brought forward in this House has given me more pain than the present. These are exactly the Motions to make which those who are responsible for the government of the country must feel to be one of the most painful duties of public life; but it is a duty we must perform to the House and the country. I do not say, as some have said before me, with great deference to the legal Gentlemen who have addressed us, that it is not for a layman to speak on subjects of this kind. He may speak with less authority, perhaps; but every Gentleman who is a Member of this House has a right, and it is his duty, to express his opinion on this subject. The power, the honour, and responsibility of Parliament, which are the foundation of its real authority, are largely involved in this question of Parliamentary law and privilege; and when I am told we should refer this question to a Committee—when I am told that by right hon. Gentlemen who show, by the hesitation of their minds, that they are not prepared to go into that Committee with much confidence in their own discrimination and opinion, I must ask myself whether the consequences of such a policy may not be such a deviation from the duty of Parliament that it must tend to lower it in the opinion of the country. What is the simple issue before us, and on which I trust we shall now come to a decision? The issue is this. We find that a convicted felon has been returned a Member to this House. We know that he is incapacitated from sitting in Parliament by being a convicted felon. He was tried in 1848, and was adjudged a sentence of transportation for 14 years. He broke his imprisonment—that is the correct word, though connected with transportation—and he has not in any way, by the acknowledged legal and constitutional modes recognized in this country, either by the exercise of the Prerogative of the Crown, or by the fulfilment of the penalty awarded to him, rehabilitated himself in the position he formerly occupied. Then we are told that, having given his parole not to exceed the bounds of his imprisonment, he one day broke it, and could wander, if he liked, over all Australia or Europe with impunity, and, therefore, we must look upon this circumstance as equivalent to his having fulfilled the penalty adjudged by the law. Well, Sir, I ask are we to accept any such proposition as that? Are we here in the House of Commons to announce that a man who took advantage of his own wrong should be able to plead his own misconduct as a good and sufficient reason why he should be permitted to avail himself of the privileges which are the most highly esteemed in this country, and which every honourable man is justly proud of? It was said early in the debate—and the opinion of an absent Member has been quoted from a letter—that transportation for a term of years means nothing more than allowing an individual to travel at his pleasure. I myself do not think so. Transportation involves duress; every lawyer and law-book will tell you that transportation is not merely exile. Transportation is carried out under statutes; it involves duress, and necessarily discipline and imprisonment, however extended the bounds which are permitted by a lenient Government or an indulgent Governor. You cannot for a moment allow a quibble of this character. This is a question upon which the House of Commons ought to decide, and it ought to decide with promptitude. I deeply regret that we are called upon to decide it; but we have to do our duty, and, if we have, let us do it completely. Do not let us say that we really do not know what are our own privileges. Do not let us say that we must have a Committee to examine into those musty precedents of which we heard the other evening, and that we really have so little confidence in our own intelligence and our own resolution that a convicted felon may come to this Table, although almost every Member of this House disapproves his taking a seat, because no one has the courage to come forward and ask the House of Commons to declare its own law and what is also the ancient law of the country. I trust, therefore, that we shall decide, and decide without doubt, upon this question. The Resolution which has been brought forward appears to me to express with clearness the point before us. And here I must say I was surprised to hear from the right hon. Gentleman who spoke just now, a criticism that we had brought forward a Resolution which did not even pretend to express that Mitchel was a felon. Now, when I look to the language of the Resolution I read—that John Mitchel, returned as a Member for the County of Tipperary, having been adjudged guilty of felony," &c. What more could the right hon. Gentleman expect? He appears not to know what a felon is. I contend that it is no part of my duty to teach the right hon. Gentleman what a felon is; but it is part of my duty, if a felon is returned to Parliament, comes to this Table, and claims to be a Representative of the people, so long as I am sitting in this place, to call upon the House of Commons to avenge its outraged privileges, and to say that "until, either by the favour of the Crown or by your own dutiful conduct, you shall have cleared yourself from this flaw you shall not take your seat in the House of Commons."

Mr. RONAYNE said, he would take no part in the legal or constitutional question which had been discussed. Mr. Mitchel had been accused of having broken his parole. It had been reserved for an Irishman first that night to accuse Mr. Mitchel of dishonour, according to the proverb that if one Irishman was to be roasted you would get another to turn the spit. The hon. and learned Gentleman to whom he referred had also said that there were men in the House not much better than Mitchel, alluding, he presumed, to him (Mr. Ronayne) among the rest. [Mr. PLUNKET dissented.] He admitted he was not much better. He had not the honour of being a convicted felon in 1848, but he ought to have been. There was no prouder reminiscence of his life than that he had been a member of the Young Ireland Party, who were remarkable for their ability, for their talents, and, above all things, for their honour. A course of action which had been approved by the late Smith O'Brien and by the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Martin) would pass in any country as honourable. The magistrate who reported Mr. Mitchel's escape stated that the prisoner entered his office, instantly quitted it, and, mounting a horse, fled before he had time to read the letter handed to him. He also said he was accompanied by a short man of sallow complexion, whom he had seen once at his office, and whose name he was informed was Smyth. Many hon. Gentlemen in the House had seen and known the man called Smyth, and he now held in his hand a telegram from that gentleman, to the effect that the statement of the magistrate was false; that Mitchel gave him full time to peruse his note, and told the magistrate twice before leaving the office what brought him there. The Habeas Corpus Suspension Act was in 1848 passed in one night, and the proceedings to-night were as precipitate and stringent, for no time had been given to have documents printed, and consequently they could not calmly and properly consider the conduct of chivalrous John Mitchel. He contended that these proceedings would have a bad effect on Irishmen; and though he had taken no part in the election because he had joined the Home Rule Party, yet it must not be supposed that Home Rulers would abandon Mr. Mitchel, or that the electors of Tipperary would not do again what they had done.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, that he proposed to withdraw his Amendment should one for the appointment of a Select Committee be made in substitution of it.

MR. O'CLERY entered his protest against the act of Her Majesty's Government, who were endeavouring to deprive of their legal rights the electors of the great county of Tipperary. The Government, by infringing the law, and thus placing themselves in the position of accessories before the fact, were bringing the Constitution into contempt. He denied that Mitchel was a revolutionist; on the contrary, he was Conservative in the true sense of the word. At a time when the Government was allowing a million of the Irish people to die of starvation, it was natural that a young Irishman should denounce its action, as John Mitchel did in 1848. His conviction was one of the most tyrannical acts done by any Government in modern times. In that same year the English Government lectured many of the Continental Governments in regard to the treatment of political offenders, but it stultified itself by its conduct towards Mr. Mitchel. In seeking to justify its proceedings in the eyes of Europe it did not hesitate to decry the personal character of the man, and it even went the length of inventing a new crime which it called by the name of treason-felony. He strongly protested against the Resolution of the right hon. Gentleman opposite.

Original Question again proposed.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said: I am not going to enter into any further discussion, nor even, as far as I am concerned, to trouble the House with another division, but, simply to put on record the grounds on which I and many others on this side of the House have voted, I will move the following Amendment:—

"That a Select Committee be appointed to consider the return of John Mitchel for the county of Tipperary, and to search for precedents and report thereupon to the House."

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "a Select Committee be appointed to consider the return of John Mitchel for the County Tipperary, and to search for precedents, and report thereupon to the House."—(The Marquess of Hartington.)

SIR GEORGE BOWYER trusted that Her Majesty's Government would re-consider the course they were taking, as the question was a question of law, and a perfectly new one, that had never been decided before. He had no doubt there were many hon. Members on the other side who entertained grave doubts on the subject. The matter had been debated by learned counsel on both sides, and he thought it would be only fair to wait a short time, until the question could be thoroughly gone into by hon. Members.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Resolved, That John Mitchel, returned as Member for the County of Tipperary, having been adjudged guilty of felony, and sentenced to transportation for fourteen years, and not having endured the punishment to which he was adjudged for such felony, or received a pardon under the Great Seal, has become, and continues, incapable of being elected or returned as a Member of this House.

NEW WRIT.

Ordered, That Mr. Speaker do issue his Warrant to the Clerk of the Crown for Ireland, to make out a New Writ for the electing of a Member to serve in this present Parliament for the County of Tipperary, in the room of John Mitchel, adjudged and sentenced as aforesaid.

INTOXICATING LIQUORS (IRELAND) BILL.

(In the Committee.)

Resolved, That the Chairman be directed to move the House, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Laws relating to the common Sale of Intoxicating Liquors in Ireland.

Resolution reported:—Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. SULLIVAN and Mr. DEASE.

CRIMINAL LAW—THE CONVICT PRISON AT GIBRALTAR.QUESTION.

LORD ABERDARE, in calling attention to the state of the Convict Prison at Gibraltar, and to ask Her Majesty's Government, Whether it is their intention to continue that establishment? said, he need hardly dwell upon the general excellence of our convict system. For many years the question of the mode of dealing with convicts had engaged a considerable amount of public attention, and the result was that we had now the best convict system ever devised for reforming the criminals and protecting society. But with regard to the prison at Gibraltar, the late Government had come to the decision that it ought to be suppressed, and he was anxious to obtain an assurance that the policy then determined upon would not be departed from. Many of their Lordships would recollect the—he might say more than alarm—the terror felt in this country at the prospect of our old system of transporting convicts being abandoned, and penal servitude being substituted in its stead. And that terror was not to be wondered at when we recollect that between the years 1840 and 1850 no fewer than 36,993 prisoners were sentenced to transportation. Of these 24,915 actually left the country, and 11,078 were sent to the hulks. The average number sentenced to transportation in each of those 10 years was 3,600. The alarm, therefore, would appear to have been by no means ill-founded. The number of persons transported in 1842 was very little short of 4,100. Transportation, except to Western Australia, ceased in 1852, when 2,541 persons were transported. Transportation absolutely ceased in 1867, and the number of persons sentenced to penal servitude in 1873 was only 1,493. In 1869, when he (Lord Aberdare) was at the Home Office, the question of accommodation in our convict prisons attracted the very serious attention of the authorities. It was found that there were some 8,000 convicts confined in those prisons, and that for 1,700 other accommodation had to be provided by contract in some of our county gaols; and it was believed that besides providing convict prisons for an additional 1,000, further accommodation for 1,000 or 1,500 would have to be found at a future time. In the same year the Home Office received from the Colonial Office a suggestion that the convict prisons in Western Australia and other colonies should be transferred to the Home Office. The suggestion was adopted, and the control of the convict prisons in Western Australia, and that at Gibraltar, was transferred. In 1870 there was sent to the Home Office a report from the Visitors of the convict prison at Gibraltar, which led to immediate inquiries, and Colonel Du Cane, the Chairman of the Board of Directors of Convict Prisons, went to Gibraltar and examined the prison, and in the report of the Superintendent there was this passage—

"The reformatory element seems to be disappearing from it [the association system] altogether, for even a convict anxious to reform has a hard, if not a hopeless, task. Of others who, under more advantageous circumstances, might possibly be reclaimed, the evils of association prevent any advice or warning from having more than a momentary effect. The punishment of the better and less depraved class of prisoners is considerably increased by their enforced association with those utterly lost to all sense of honesty and decency, and whose whole lives have been lives of crime; and I fear there is but little doubt that some leave a prison of this class worse in every respect than when they entered it. The punitive element is also under this system reduced to the minimum possible in a prison, and I much doubt if it is sufficiently felt by the convicts, so as to act as a deterrent from crime for the future."—[Superintendent of Gibraltar Convict Prison, App. 497.]

He might observe that the number of male convicts in custody for England and Wales was 8,678, and of these there were in the Gibraltar prison 338. Well, after the inquiry in 1870, his noble Friend who then filled the office of Secretary for the Colonies (the Earl of Kimberley) arrived at the conclusion that the Gibraltar prison, as an establishment for convicts, ought to be abolished as soon as an arrangement could be made for the transfer of the prisoners elsewhere. He himself arrived at the same conclusion; and it seemed that the time when such arrangements might be made would arrive much sooner than could have been anticipated a few years ago, by reason of the marked diminution in the number of persons sentenced to penal servitude. In 1869, the number so sentenced was 2,006; in 1870, it was 1,788; in 1871, it was 1,627; in 1872, it was 1,514; and in 1873, it was 1,493. The result was that at this moment, instead of having to provide extended accommodation for nearly 2,500 prisoners, no addition was required, except for convict prisoners received into county gaols, and there was ample accommodation in our convict prisons for the absorption of the prisoners now sent to Gibraltar. In the determination at which he and his noble Friend had arrived, they were influenced by a consideration founded on the Report made with respect to the Gibraltar prison. It appeared that in that prison it would not be possible to give effect to the recommendation of the Penal Servitude Acts Commission, which sat in 1863. In the Report of that Commission, it was stated—

"The employment of convicts where they can hold communication with free labourers is objectionable, and ought not to be allowed. For this reason work in a dockyard, where such communication can hardly be prevented, is not suitable for convicts."

Unexpectedly good results followed from the adoption in this country of that recommendation of the Royal Commission, and since the time when the building of the Chatham Convict Prison was undertaken great improvements in the working of our convict system had been effected throughout the Kingdom. He would ask what was the object of punishment? The first object of all punishment was that it should be deterrent; and in order that it should be so, it ought to be made hateful to prisoners. There was nothing they disliked so much as monotony; and this penal servitude could not be made, so long as the convicts were allowed connection with the outer world. The second object of punishment was, that it should have such an effect on a prisoner as to fit him to take his place again as a useful member of society when he should be sent back to it after ending his sentence. Therefore, the discipline of a prison should be such as not only to have a good effect upon the prisoner while under confinement, but that that good effect should continue after his discharge. That, at all events, was the object sought to be effected by our present system, and to a large extent it was successful. But no such useful and good results were likely to be produced by the system pursued at Gibraltar—nor, indeed, were any such results possible under such a system. All moral and philanthropic objects were defeated by it, instead of being fostered. The Royal Commission of 1863 recommended that no sentence of penal servitude should be for a less period than five years, and that no second sentence of penal servitude should be for less than seven years. And why? With the object of breaking up the criminal habits of the convict. But this was defeated by the system at Gibraltar. And yet this inefficient system was more expensive, even in the primary outlay, than our efficient system at home. First, there was the cost of transport to Gibraltar; next, the cost of maintenance there was more expensive than the cost of maintenance at home; and again, the officers of the prison at Gibraltar were paid more than the officers of the prisons at home. Moreover, without casting the slightest blame on the officers of the Gibraltar establishment, they had not the training of prison officers in this country. But, it was said that the convict prison at Gibraltar was a necessity. What was the advantage of it? The only real reason he could see for its maintenance was, that it provided a certain amount of convict labour for the use of the naval and military authorities. He had every desire that convict labour should be used when it could be used with advantage to the prisoners and to the public; but he did not believe this could be the case in Gibraltar. He did not believe that the advantage derived from the labour of 338 convicts there counterbalanced the very great disadvantages of a system which sent back to this country numbers of wholly unreformed convicts. Could not military labour be employed instead of that of the convicts. There was a large force of soldiers at Gibraltar, and he believed that of the hundreds of Sappers and Miners there not one-third of that number were employed at any regular labour. His great object was to impress upon the Government, that as the Gibraltar system was hopelessly and radically bad, they were not justified in maintaining it, and he hoped to hear from the Government that it was their intention to put an end to it.

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE: Before my noble Friend the Secretary for the Colonies replies to my noble Friend who has just addressed your Lordships, I wish to place before your Lordships and the country—because I think it is little understood—the difficulty, if not the impossibility, of carrying on the works at the great garrison of Gibraltar unless we have the assistance of convict labour. I have had some personal experience of Gibraltar, because I began my military life there, and I know it as well as I do your Lordships' House. I believe it is not only necessary to employ convict labour there, but it would be exceedingly difficult to get civil labour. I certainly was not there after convicts were sent out, and therefore I have not had an opportunity of personally witnessing the results of the contact between convict labour and civil labour; but I have made inquiries on that point, and from the statement of a distinguished officer—the present Adjutant General of the Army, who was five years Governor of Gibraltar—I am led to believe that the contact so much complained of does not exist to the extent your Lordships and the public generally suppose it to exist. I am not going to argue the question of employing convict labour on public works, but I wish to point out how impossible it is to introduce the civil element at Gibraltar within the town of Gibraltar, and that town, as now inhabited, cannot produce civil labour sufficient to complete the great works in progress there, to maintain them when made, and to carry out the dockyard duties essential at such a station. I think my noble Friend (Lord Aberdare), after such a Report as has been made on the prison establishment at Gibraltar, is justified in asking what is to be done; but I think my noble Friend ought not to have gone the length of expressing a hope that the convict establishment would be put an end to. The question is entirely one of administration—it is a question of having a proper convict establishment at Gibraltar. If it be not a proper establishment it can be made so, and it is not in itself unhealthy. I cannot see why it should not be as easy to have an effective convict prison there as it is at Portsmouth, Chatham, or Cork. I believe the existing prison at Gibraltar is a bad one, and that there have been great irregularities there; but I think that even in this respect there has been exaggeration. It is badly organized, but I believe there have been great improvements, and that many of the irregularities have been corrected. I admit that it is not very easy to carry on a proper convict establishment in a badly constructed prison such as that at Gibraltar; but I think the War Office authorities can have no wish to throw any obstacle in the way of the erection of a proper convict establishment at that fortress. My noble Friend (Lord Aberdare) is in error in thinking that the soldiers of the garrison are not fully employed there. There is a large extent of sentinel duty. Sir Richard Airey endeavoured to abridge it, but found himself obliged to put on again men whom he had taken off duty. I am authorized by the highest authority to say that the number of soldiers employed on the public works cannot be increased, due regard being had to the garrison duty. The present Governor, Sir William Fenwick Williams, so late as October last, stated that he did not know what to do for men. Again, my noble Friend is entirely misinformed as to the amount of work done by the Engineers at Gibraltar. The only alternative, if we want more military labour, is to send out more regiments, and if we do that we must have more barracks—at present there is absolutely no room for more men. Now, I can assure my noble Friend that new barracks would cost more than a new convict prison. The question brought under the notice of your Lordships by my noble Friend is a most serious one. There are none of your Lordships who would not wish to see the fortress of Gibraltar properly kept up. It cannot be if convict labour is not employed there. It has been employed at Chatham and other places in this country with advantage, but nowhere can it be more legitimately employed than at Gibraltar. There is no civil labour there; or at best, what civil labour there is must continue to be very restricted; and therefore in no place does the convict element interfere less with the civil element. There is less sickness in the Gibraltar prisons than in convict prisons at home. I cannot see, therefore, why it should be said that the convict establishment should be given up in a place where it is so useful, merely because it is not at present conducted on as good a system as it might be. If the prison system is bad, we should make it better.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, he did not feel it necessary to follow the noble Lord (Lord Aberdare) into a discussion of our convict system—he should confine himself to that of the convict establishment at Gibraltar. As the illustrious Duke (the Duke of Cambridge) had put it, this question was very important from an Imperial point of view—it was also, like many other questions, one which must be determined by the balance of advantages and disadvantages. On the one hand, he was prepared to admit that the convict establishment at Gibraltar was by no means satisfactory:—it was an old-fashioned one, it was unsuited to modern requirements, and it had connected with it that evil of association among the labourers to which the noble Lord had drawn attention; but, on the other hand, as the illustrious Duke had pointed out, the prison itself was not an unhealthy one—indeed, the health of the prisoners within its walls was better than that of the prisoners in the best prison in England. He agreed with the illustrious Duke when he said that the question was one of administration. The noble Lord (Lord Aberdare) quoted a Report for the purpose of showing that it was quite impossible to have proper discipline in that prison; but for his own part, he could not see why the discipline of a convict prison might not be as good at Gibraltar as in this country, provided that rules were properly framed and laid down, and that English officers were appointed to the prisons and held responsible for the carrying out of those regulations. To a certain extent he must own he agreed with the noble Lord; but, on the other hand, the loss of convict labour would be a very serious one at Gibraltar. As the illustrious Duke had pointed out, great works had already been performed by convict labour. He believed that within the last 22 years the total amount of work done for the War Office and the Admiralty at Gibraltar was not less in value than £250,000, and the greater part of that was the work of convicts. The greater part of the New Mole had been constructed by these men. The illustrious Duke had also pointed out that a great deal of work of a difficult and necessary kind remained to be done, and certainly it was not easy to see how it was to be done without convict labour, for civil labour did not exist sufficient for the requirements of the garrison. All this work was of primary and paramount importance, because it was necessary for the maintenance and defence of the fortress; and the conditions of the place were such that we did not nor could not hope to command any large amount of civil labour there;—and assuming even that high pay were offered to attract a civilian population in considerable numbers, it would be extremely difficult to decide the question of housing them. It was possible to house the convicts properly—it was a mere question of money and belonged to the civil Departments. The noble Lord knew that this subject of the convict establishment at Gibraltar was one which had been debated by Departments of the Government. The noble Lord had been consistent, and, as he had told their Lordships, when he was at the Home Office he endeavoured to remove what he looked upon as a blot; but the correspondence showed that his noble Friend the late Secretary for War (Lord Cardwell) was not of quite the same opinion. He protested, and no doubt his right hon. Friend the present Secretary for War would adopt the same course, and protest against the removal of this convict establishment; but, as he had already said, the question was one which must be decided by the balance of advantages: and if the abolition of the convict establishment at Gibraltar was resolved upon Parliament must be prepared for a considerable outlay. The noble Lord said that the system pursued at Gibraltar was an expensive one; but its expense was as nothing compared with the substitute which would be rendered necessary if convict labour there should be given up, and if it was to be done by soldiers, Parliament must be prepared for a considerable addition to the military and naval Votes. This might be unpleasant, but it would be a result of what the noble Lord was now urging. He cordially agreed with the noble Lord that so far as abuses of the present system were concerned no Government would do right in allowing them to continue; but he could not agree that the present system was totally inconsistent with proper discipline and administration. It was perfectly true that the tendency of the last two or three years had been towards the removal of this convict establishment; and, indeed, steps had been taken very far in that direction; but if his Colleagues, the Secretary of War and the First Lord of the Admiralty, should consider the door closed by considerations of increased expenditure, he thought that in a matter which affected Imperial interests, there should be the most full and careful consideration before a final determination was arrived at.

EARL GREY said, he thought a case had been made out for the removal of this convict establishment. He believed it to be impossible to correct the evils and abuses complained of without going to the root of the matter, and abolishing the establishment altogether. It was impossible to avoid the association of the convicts and free labourers, and he could not consider Government justified in continuing a system which brought back to this country a number of convicts who, instead of being reformed, were worse than when they were sent out—and that seemed to be the result of employing convict labour in such a place as Gibraltar. He submitted that we were not justified on any considerations of mere convenience in keeping up a system which we knew to be bad. It would be better to allow the works at Gibraltar to advance a little more gradually than to keep up such a system. But he was persuaded that there was no real necessity for its maintenance. As for the employment of free labour it was notorious that it was less expensive than forced labour. He received with all respect everything which came from the illustrious Duke, but he felt convinced that arrangements might be made by which more military labour might be procured for the works. He would respectfully ask the illustrious Duke not to place too much reliance on the reports of military officers on the employment of soldiers in civil labour. For the last 40 years military officers had shown an indisposition to have soldiers so employed; and to such an extent was the indisposition carried, that when the camp at Aldershot was being formed some of those gallant gentlemen recommended that instead of having the ground turned up and other such work done by soldiers, it would be better to have it done by contract with civilians. Work at civil labour was excellent training for soldiers. The first Napoleon and generals in the recent civil war in America bore testimony to that. He thought that with our system of short enlistment the men should not be put through a course of military training only, but should be instructed in such work as would enable them to get employment when they retired from the Army, and he was convinced they would not prove the worse soldiers because they had been employed part of their time on public works. As to finding room for additional men, if the convicts were now removed from Gibraltar the prison they now occupied, and which appeared to be a very healthy one, would be available for soldiers.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, it was now many years since his official position made him acquainted with convict labour, and therefore he spoke with some hesitation on the subject. His opinion was that, as regarded the dockyards, convict labour mixed up with free labour was objectionable; but, on the other hand, he thought the employment of convict labour in the works at Chatham had been very advantageous. He went down there frequently when the convicts were at work, and observed much emulation between different sets of convict brickmakers. He did not believe there was one of those men who, when he left the works at Chatham, might not have obtained employment outside. But when their Lordships came to deal with the question of convict labour in such a place as Gibraltar, they found it mixed up with great difficulties. There appeared to be a great deal that was objectionable in the way it was now employed there; yet he should hope that before the Government decided on doing away with it they would have a more careful inquiry on the subject. No doubt, on the one hand, there were persons who looked upon the question of secondary punishment solely as a means of reforming the convict and returning him a useful member of society. On the other hand, there were persons who thought that men convicted of serious offences against society were properly employed by being compelled to labour on public works, and military officers regarded the value of the labour rather than the reformation of the criminal. The naval and military works at Gibraltar were of great national importance. If the convict establishment was discontinued, paid labour must be substituted, and the difficulty of supplying this labour, as well as the great cost, must be carefully considered. The question must be looked at from a national point of view, and he trusted that the Government would not hastily adopt any proposition without having, by means of a Committee or otherwise, obtained a full Report of all the information that could be obtained.

CHURCH BUILDINGS AND RESTORATION—RETURN.—QUESTION.

LORD HAMPTON asked the Lord Steward, How soon the Return ordered last Session, showing "the number of churches which had been built or restored at a cost exceeding £500 since the year 1840" will be presented to the House? He had seen the Return from the diocese of Worcester, to which he belonged, which was of a most satisfactory character, fully bearing out the objects and intentions for which he wished to have the information. He trusted that the Returns from the other dioceses, which seemed to have been somewhat delayed, would prove of an equally satisfactory character.

EARL BEAUCHAMP said, he was afraid he could not give the noble Lord any precise information as to when the Returns he wished for would be laid upon the Table, inasmuch as the information they would contain was not to be found in any Government Department. Steps had been taken to obtain the information sought; but as the action was voluntary, the Government could not compel or hasten the answers. Forms had been sent to the Archbishops and Bishops of the several dioceses, by them to be transmitted to their rural deans and other ecclesiastical authorities. Comparatively few of the dioceses had as yet made complete Returns, and from the Province of York no information whatever had as yet been obtained. He trusted the Returns referred to would be forthcoming shortly, and that the Question of the noble Lord would act as a stimulant upon the various ecclesiastical authorities who could give the information required.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, that at the time when the noble Lord (Lord Hampton) moved for the Returns, he had pointed out the difficulties in the way of furnishing them, particularly in a large diocese like that of London, and accordingly the difficulties had been very great. It was easy enough to ascertain what churches had been built within the last 35 years, but it involved no slight labour to discover the cost of each, and still more to ascertain what churches in the diocese had been repaired to the extent of £500 during that period. It was no part of the Bishop's business to keep accounts of that kind, which were, doubtless, destroyed after a certain time; and only vague traditions remained of when churches had been repaired, and what the costs of such repairs had been. He had received the Returns from all the rural deans of his diocese except three—they were no doubt as accurate as they could be made;—and he might add that in proportion to the conscientiousness with which the Returns were prepared, so, perhaps, would the delay be of making them.

WOOLWICH ACADEMY—THE NEW REGULATIONS.—QUESTION.

LORD MONTEAGLE asked the Under Secretary for War, Whether it is intended under the new regulations for admission to Woolwich Academy to confer an exceptional advantage upon classics as over all other subjects in the examination?

THE EARL OF PEMBROKE said, the explanation he had to give to the noble Lord was, that the effect of the new Regulations, which would come into operation in July next, would be to diminish, not to increase, the importance of classics in the examination at Woolwich. Under the old Regulations of 1871, 3,000 marks were given for Latin and 3,000 for English—being in each case 1,000 more marks than were given for any other subjects except mathematics—the object being that boys who had the advantage of a public school education might proceed straight to Woolwich without the interposition of professional “crammers.” It was, however, found by experience that those expectations had not been fully realized. Latin and English were taken up as cram-subjects by all alike, on account of the great number of marks given for them, and the low standard of the Latin examination, and one result to be deprecated was that mathematics and foreign languages were somewhat neglected. Under the new system Latin and Greek together, instead of having 5,000 marks, as against 4,500 awarded to mathematics, would have 4,000 as against 6,000, and in English the marks would be reduced to 2,000. It was believed that this alteration would be attended with beneficial results.

VISCOUNT CARDWELL considered the explanation of the noble Earl quite satisfactory. The object at which the authorities aimed in fixing these standards was to obtain the best men for the Army from the whole educational surface of the country, and the great evil against which they had to guard was that of cramming. He knew from experience that those who were entrusted with the carrying out of this complicated and difficult system must watch its operation from time to time, and advise the making of such alterations in it as might seem to be desirable. He believed that the public servants who had made this change had given much consideration to the subject, and he hoped the system they had adopted would prove successful. If it did not, then they must only try back and further modify it.

House adjourned at a quarter before Seven o'clock, to Monday next, a quarter before Five o'clock.

THE MAGISTRACY—APPOINTMENT OF MAGISTRATES.—QUESTION.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is a fact that recently in the city of Durham and in the boroughs of Newcastle-on-Tyne, Tyne-mouth, Sunderland, Stockton-on-Tees, and Middlesborough, forty-three new magistrates have been appointed; if his attention has been drawn to the fact that thirty-four out of the forty-three gentlemen appointed belong to the Conservative party; and that in some cases, as at Middlesborough the appointments were made without the knowledge of the local corporate and magisterial authorities; and as at Newcastle and Tynemouth, while influential gentlemen of liberal opinions were recommended for appointment by Members of both political parties in the Town Councils of these boroughs, their names were set aside; and, if he is prepared to lay upon the Table the Correspondence that has taken place respecting these several appointments?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, since the Question was put on the Paper, having nothing to do with the appointment of magistrates, as the House must be well aware, he had communicated with the Lord Chancellor, and had been informed by him that since April, 1874, additions to the Bench had been made for Newcastle, Durham, Sunderland, Tynemouth, Middlesborough, and Stockton-on-Tees. Those appointments had been—for Newcastle 13, Durham four, Sunderland eight, Tynemouth eight, Middlesborough four, and Stockton-on-Tees six. In all those cases the Lord Chancellor was satisfied that additional magistrates were required, and that the gentlemen selected were in all respects eligible. It was a misapprehension to suppose that magistrates in boroughs were appointed by the Lord Chancellor on the recommendation of municipal corporations, or of any other public body or individual. The responsibility of such appointments rested solely with the Lord Chancellor, who was, however, always ready to receive and give full consideration to any communication made to him from municipal corporations, or other public bodies or individuals, as to the state of the Bench. In the cases referred to, he had received and examined all the recommendations of the town councils, mayors, or magistrates, when any such recommendations were made. They were made in the cases of Newcastle, Tynemouth, and Stockton-on-Tees. In the case of Stockton, all the names recommended by the mayor and the magistrates were appointed; in the case of Newcastle all those recommended by the magistrates and the town council were appointed except one; and in the case of Tynemouth all who were recommended by the town council were appointed except one. The Lord Chancellor could not undertake to say to what political parties the gentlemen appointed belonged; and it was not the practice to lay on the Table any correspondence as to magisterial appointments.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN gave Notice that on an early day he would call the attention of the House to those appointments.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS—THE SHIP "MARY ANN."—QUESTION.

MR. GOURLEY asked the President of the Board of Trade, If it be correct that after receiving a report from the Board of Trade Surveyors at Hull that the ship "Mary Ann" was unfit to proceed to sea without serious danger to human life, an order was subsequently made that the vessel might proceed to sea provided the owner would execute a bond and sail in her himself; if so, what guarantee this gave for the safety of the crew if the ship were unseaworthy?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: The case is before one of the Superior Courts; I therefore abstain from stating anything affecting the points in dispute. I must, however, say that the hon. Gentleman has not quite correctly stated the facts of the case, which are these—It was at the owner's request that the Mary Ann was allowed to proceed to Sunderland for repairs, the owner having no means to get the work done at Hull. He requested to be allowed to proceed with her himself, and to give a bond of £500 to secure his going to Sunderland. The Board of Trade assented, and imposed the further conditions that he should start early on a fine morning, and be provided with a lifeboat, and should go in tow.

CRIMINAL LAW—COMMITTAL OF A BLIND BOY.—QUESTION.

MR. W. JOHNSTON asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether, immediately subsequent to the imprisonment of the blind boy John M'Cracken, by order of the Mayor of Drogheda, for reading the Bible in the street, his father was committed to prison, for four-without the option of a fine, on his dissatisfaction at the his son received; whether by order of the Mayor; a sentence was afterwards the charge book; and, elder M'Cracken has since ng from severe illness, and in prison?

PEACE PRESERVATION ACTS (IRELAND).—QUESTION.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, he wished to put a Question to the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. Yesterday there appeared upon the Paper a Notice that the Chief Secretary would call the attention of the House to the statutes generally known as the Peace Preservation (Ireland) Acts, and move for leave to introduce a Bill. At his part of the House it was impossible to gather what had passed on that subject on the previous evening, and he found no record of it on the Votes. He therefore wished to ask, what course the Government intended to pursue on the matter?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, he was obliged to the noble Lord for giving him an opportunity of stating his intention to the House. He intended to call the attention of the House to that subject on Monday, the 1st of March.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, he would give Notice that on Tuesday next he would move for a Return of the names of the persons arrested in the county of Westmeath under the powers of the Peace Preservation Acts of 1870 and 1873, showing the time of detention of each prisoner, the names of those who were still in custody, together with copies of any memorials, with the signatures attached thereto, which had been presented for the release of any of those prisoners; and that on Monday he would ask the Chief Secretary whether that Return could be obtained in time for the Motion which the right hon. Baronet intended to make on the 1st of March?

FACTORIES ACTS EXTENSION.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. W. HOLMS, in rising to move—

"That a Select Committee be appointed to ascertain and report how far it is expedient and practicable to extend the provisions of the Facories (Health of Women, &c.) Act, 1874, to manufactures and occupations other than textile, and further to consider and report upon the consolidation of all existing Factory and Workshop Regulation Acts."

said: I am not sure that I quite comprehend the scope of the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Home Department, when, last evening, in replying to a Question by the hon. Member for Leeds (Mr. Tennant), he intimated that the Government proposed to appoint a Royal Commission to inquire into the Factory Acts; nor am I certain whether he proposes to embrace in that inquiry all that is covered by my Resolution. I will, therefore, as briefly and as clearly as I can, state my reasons for asking that a Select Committee be appointed as proposed in the Resolution. From a Return made in 1871—the last Return on the subject—I find that there are 1,258,000 women, children, and young persons under Government protection so far as regards Factory and Workshop Acts. By passing the Factory Act of 1874, the principle was affirmed that on sanitary and educational grounds it is the duty of the State to interfere for the protection of children and young persons. The Factory Act referred to embraced only textile factories, in which 667,000 women, children, and young persons were employed. Under that Act children can only be employed at 10 years of age as half-timers, and subsequently for full time at the age of 14. There is a provision that a child who has passed a certain educational standard may begin at 13 years of age to work full time. Of the 591,000 women, young persons, and children who were not affected by the Act of last year, 210,000 were under Factory Acts passed prior to 1874. Their condition is very different. Children are allowed to work half-time at 8 years of age, and full time at 13, whatever may be the state of their education. Those factories are limited by law to work 60 hours a-week; but, practically—owing to certain modifications and exemptions—they may work on an average 63 or 66 hours. It cannot be urged that the occupation of those engaged in them is more healthy, or their toil less severe, than that of those engaged in textile factories. Mr. Redgrave, one of the Chief Inspectors of Factories, in a recent Report, says—

"The experience I have had of the nature of work in all kinds of factories and workshops is that old factories—that is, textile factories—show abundant proof of the fostering care of Government, and that occupations infinitely more unhealthy, and labour twice as hard physically, are to be found in the factories brought under inspection by the Factory Acts of 1864 and 1867."

And adds—

"I know of no cotton factory in which young persons have to endure a temperature of 120 degrees as they have in the stove of a pottery; I know no labour more severe than that of a fustian cutter; or I know of no occupation more deadly than that of a millstone cutter."

The remaining 381,000 were under the Workshop Act; but, as the Returns in respect to workshops are very incomplete, I believe it is a moderate estimate to take the number as equal to those employed in textile factories. What are the hours of labour? Nominally the same as in factories, but practically much longer. The work may be performed at any time between 6 in the morning and 8 in the evening by children, and from 5 till 9 by adults. The consequence is, that unless the Factory Inspector carefully watches the time at which each individual begins, he cannot with any certainty enforce the law. Children may therefore be employed long hours without fear of detection. Then, again, under the present Act it is extremely difficult to tell what is a workshop and what is a factory. For instance, you may have a small machine-making establishment with two boys and two men employed; and if driven by steam-power this is a factory. In the adjoining premises, under the same roof, driven by the same steam-engine, employing 40 children and five men, another establishment engaged in making buttons is in the eye of the law a workshop. In the former, where there are two boys, they must be registered; but that is unnecessary in the latter. In the former, there must be a medical certificate of the age of each boy employed—in the latter, nothing of the sort. In the former, the boys can demand two full and eight half-holidays a-year—in the latter, the boys cannot claim even Christmas or Good Friday. In the former, the machinery must be fenced—in the latter, there is no such provision. In the former, sanitary regulations must be carefully observed. The factory must be clean, well-ventilated, and the walls whitewashed. As regards workshops there are no such provisions. What makes the absurdity of the position more apparent is, that you find men employed in the same trade under different laws. A brickwork with 50 men and one boy employed is a factory. Another brickwork where 40 children and young persons are employed and only five men is a workshop. It is unjust alike to employer and employed to have laws so different applied to industries the conditions of which are identical. I will now call attention to the conditions which have arisen since the passing of the Education Act of 1870. Last Session the Vice President of Council on Education said in this House—

"That in most large towns compulsory bye-laws had been adopted, and it was unanimously determined that a child should be kept at school till the age of 10."

The Education Act of 1870 gives no power to interfere with children employed in factories or workshops; these children being under the educational clauses of their several Acts. So far as the Act of 1874 is concerned, it is in harmony with the Act of 1870. Children cannot work in factories until the age of 10, and they must attend efficient schools sanctioned by the Privy Council. The position of children employed in workshops is very different; they are only required to attend school 10 hours per week—that may be at any time during the week; and if they are absent from work during one day in the week, they cannot be compelled to attend school during that week. What is the consequence of this irregularity? Good schools will not receive those children; and Mr. Redgrave has, in one of his Reports, made the melancholy confession—

"We are driven to accept mere apologies for schools, and greatly to our dissatisfaction to countenance what is after all a mere mockery of education."

My hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella) justly characterized the Workshop Act as an Act for preventing education. There is another reason why we should have no unnecessary delay in legislation—it is an undoubted fact that the measure passed last year is not national but sectional in its character. In Blackburn there are 17,302 women and children and young persons engaged in textile manufactures under the Act of 1874, while there are only 1,009 otherwise employed, and therefore exempt from its provisions. In Sheffield there are 12,236 employed in the industries of that town, but not one of them has the benefit of the Act of 1874. I have this morning received a letter from a well-known cotton-spinner in Bolton, a supporter, I believe, of the right hon. Member for South-west Lancashire, who writes that the consequence of the exemptions of brickworks, paper works, &c., from the Factory Acts is, that children are sent to these trades because they can be employed one year younger than in textile factories, where they have often a difficulty in keeping the machinery going for want of children. The matter is made worse by the labour in these places being more severe than in cotton mills. If this anomaly is not removed by law, he says, there will be serious difficulty in getting hands for the cotton mills. It might be said that there had been no agitation in reference to this question. To some extent this was true, and the reason was obvious. Last year the Government led this House and the country to expect that a Select Committee would be appointed to inquire into the whole subject as soon as possible; but as that has been delayed, the consequence is, that in many parts of the country there is already a certain amount of agitation. In my own neighbourhood, large meetings have been held in connection with bleach-works, and I believe the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Macdonald) has a Bill to bring before the House, with a view to give those employed in bleach-works the benefit of the Act of 1874. I think it not at all unlikely that we shall have hon. Members introducing Bills for many trades which have not the benefit of that Act. They may urge—and I do not see how you can resist the argument—that what is good for children and young persons employed in cotton factories cannot be bad for children and young persons employed in glass or iron works, and that what is fair for a cotton spinner cannot be unfair for an iron founder. We have already had too much piecemeal legislation in connection with our factory system. There is nothing more to be deprecated than continually re-opening up this question, and I believe if the country is assured that we are to have a full inquiry with a view to legislation, the result will be awaited with patience. I come now to the last portion of the Resolution—that relating to consolidation, the importance of which can scarcely be over-rated. Fortunately, there is no difficulty in proving its necessity. We have no fewer than 15 Factory and Workshop Acts, and so complicated are they with exemptions and modifications, and conflicting clauses, that they are very difficult to understand. The experience of the sub-Inspectors, some of whom are men of great educational acquirements, and of magistrates and Judges who have to make convictions, all tend to the conclusion that the sooner the present state of things is remedied the better. Lord Colonsay, the late Justice General of the Scotch Court of Session, gave it as his opinion that it would be a great assistance to those who had to administer the Factory Acts, if there was one consolidated statute. Mr. Fraser, the well-known author of The Law of Master and Servant, said these Acts refer to a class of the population whose labour and education they regulate, to whom clear directions are absolutely necessary, and yet a more confused jumble of legislative enactment does not exist in the Statute Book. Another authority which the House would receive with the highest respect, the Home Secretary himself, said last Session that nothing would give him greater satisfaction than to bring before the House a measure for the consolidation of the whole of the Factory Acts. The task would be rendered comparatively easy if the two broad principles applied to the Act of 1874 were adopted. One was, that no child should be employed in a factory under the age of 10 years. The other was, that a child must be sent to an efficient school sanctioned by the Education Board. By the Act passed last year, the Home Secretary has shown that he is in favour of the policy of protecting children and young persons, a wise and beneficent policy, which, by making them stronger and better educated, must in the long run tend greatly to increase the wealth and prosperity of the country. I do not ask for hasty legislation; but I would urge on the House that, with the least possible delay, a question so deeply affecting alike employers and employed should be fairly, fully, and calmly considered with a view to further legislation, and that laws, which are acknowledged to be in a state of confusion, should be consolidated and rendered intelligible. In conclusion, I beg to move the Resolution which stands in my name.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "a Select Committee be appointed to ascertain and report how far it is expedient and practicable to extend the provisions of the Factories (Health of Women, &c.) Act; 1874, to manufactures and occupations other than textile, and further to consider and report upon the consolidation of all existing Factory and Workshop Regulation Acts,"—(Mr. William Holmes)—instead thereof.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he agreed with much that had fallen from the hon. Member, who had evidently a thorough understanding of the subject. When the question was before the House last year he (Mr. Cross) stated—at any rate he intended to state—that it was the intention of Government to take a broader view of the matter than was laid down in the Act of 1874, and to bring forward a measure for promoting the health and education of the children and young persons employed in other than textile manufactures. At that time he also stated that no one was more painfully aware than himself of the confusion into which the Factory Acts had fallen, and that he was determined to remedy the evil. To that statement he still adhered, and he hoped the hon. Member would credit him with an intention to carry out the policy then announced, although he had not moved in the matter so early in the Session. The amount of school attendance enforced at present was a mere shadow, and such a state of things was absolutely indefensible. Different rules prevailed in different trades, children were therefore employed in some trades much longer than in others, and the consequence was, that before legislation could be attempted it would be necessary to have full information upon the subject. Therefore, all the Government had yet done towards carrying out its declaration of last year was to consider what form the inquiry had best take in order to lead to a satisfactory result. He had hinted last year that the Government would consent to the appointment of a Committee for that purpose, but further consideration had led them to the conclusion that a Royal Commission would be preferable. He would only say now that he was determined that all children employed in manufactures should, as soon as possible, have the benefit of as much education and enjoy such advantages of health as legislation could secure for them. With these two objects in view, the Commission would be appointed, and, having said this much, he hoped the hon. Member would not proceed with his Motion.

MR. W. E. FORSTER expressed the pleasure he felt at the course which the Government intended to pursue. He thought his hon. Friend (Mr. W. Holms) would feel that his object had been gained, and would not press the subject further. Although a Committee might, in some respects, have been advantageous, he cordially accepted the Home Secretary's proposal that the necessary information should be collected by a Royal Commission. He thought a Commission would be the most likely to furnish complete and exhaustive information.

MR. MUNDELLA said, he was gratified at hearing that the Home Secretary would completely redeem his pledge of last year by the appointment of a Royal Commission to inquire into this subject. He (Mr. Mundella) believed the proposed legislation was just as essential in the interests of education as in the interests of health, and he had had the pleasure of introducing a deputation from school boards to the late Vice President, who represented to him that it was utterly impossible to obtain a fair standard of education while children were employed in workshops at 8 years of age. That was so, for one of the effects of the Education Act of 1870 had been to bring into existence a larger number of what were called "private adventure schools," but which were in reality schools of evasion. They were not under any inspection, there was not any register kept, and no instruction could be given to the children, since, in many instances, those who represented themselves as teachers did not know how to read or write. The children were sent to those schools just as they might be put into any other house for a certain number of hours each day. They were schools established only for the purpose of satisfying the requirements of the Workshops Act. Yet he was informed that in one of the largest towns of England, 20 per cent of the children were attending these schools. He was thankful that the Home Secretary was prepared to deal with the whole subject, and he trusted that when the Royal Commission had reported, he would have the courage to take up the question of juvenile labour in an effectual manner. If they enacted that no child should work until 10 years of age, and should until then attend an efficient school; and also that they should not pass to the category of full-time labourer until they had passed a certain standard of education, they would do much for the health of the children of the country, but more for their education, and would give satisfaction to most employers throughout the length and breadth of the land. Whatever interests might be represented in that House, he trusted hon. Members would all feel it to be their duty to secure a uniform good education to all the children in this country, whatever might be the employment in which they were engaged, and to protect their health as far as possible. He quite agreed in the policy of consolidation, and to show its necessity, he might mention that he was lately in the suburbs of a large town, and found that in one district no less than seven Acts of Parliament were in force—two relating to textile fabrics, three to workshops, and four to mines; but the brickyard and agricultural children were under no inspection whatever. In conclusion, he could only express the hope that the hon. Member for Paisley would not press his Motion after the statement which had been made by the Home Secretary. The object they had in view would be more effectually secured by the appointment of a Royal Commission than by an inquiry before a Select Committee of the House. He felt sure that hon. Members of both parties and of all shades of opinion in the House would give credit to the Home Secretary for an earnest desire to promote in every way the educational and social welfare of the people.

MR. KINNAIRD concurred generally in the remarks of the hon. Member who had just spoken, and expressed a hope that the Home Secretary would extend the proposed inquiry to all children in all the different trades. Such a course, he believed, would be in accordance with the views of his constituents, and he tendered thanks in his own name and in theirs for the decision to which the Home Secretary had come. During the last Election he found that a great change had taken place in the feelings of his constituents on this question. At one time the parent was jealous of restriction upon his child's labour; but the effect of recent legislation had been entirely to alter opinion on the subject, and he knew no question of greater interest than the protection of children by an extension of the principle of the Factory Acts. If the Government continued to aid private Members in this way, and endeavoured to carry out what was most essential for the good of the people, they would not fail to gain the support of the country generally.

MR. MACDONALD said, he would not have troubled the House, but for a reference made to himself by the hon. Member for Paisley. Last Session those engaged in bleach-works and dye-works placed themselves in communication with him, with respect to the extension of the Factory Acts to their occupations. At their request he had a Bill prepared, and he was about to introduce it; but having learned from the Home Secretary that the Government intended to issue a Royal Commission for the purpose of inquiring into that as well as other trades to which the Workshops Act applied, he at once gave up the intention of introducing such a Bill. He could only say, with the right hon. Gentleman who had already spoken, that he greatly preferred a Commission to a Select Committee. His constituents were much in favour of a Royal Commission, believing that inquiries made on the spot, or in the immediate locality, were much more likely to be effective than an inquiry made in one of the Committees Rooms of the House. No class to whom such inquiries formerly applied, or for whom Parliament had legislated, were, he believed, more deserving of attention than those women and young persons who were employed in the bleaching and dye-works of this country. He hoped the hon. Member for Paisley would withdraw his Motion, and leave the matter in the hands of Her Majesty's Government.

MR. DALRYMPLE said, he thought the hon. Member for Paisley had every reason to be satisfied with the answer which he had received, though it did not come exactly in the form which he had asked for. He (Mr. Dalrymple) had no more opportunity of knowing beforehand what was the opinion of Her Majesty's Government on the proposal of the Motion than the hon. Member for Paisley had, but, having called the attention of the House to the subject two years ago, and pointed out the inadequacy of the staff of Inspectors, under the Factories and Workshops Acts, he would take the liberty of making a few observations. It was even more important, in his opinion, than the consolidation of the Acts, that they should be enforced. Unfortunately, however, owing in many places to the insufficiency of the inspecting body, the Acts could not be said to be enforced. On the former occasion he brought forward a variety of evidence to show how very ineffectual the enforcement of the Acts was in the Black Country, in Bedfordshire, and other portions of the Midland Counties. The same remarks might be made now in regard to some of these districts. Two years ago he mentioned Bromsgrove and its neighbourhood, and since that time a great improvement had taken place there. The vicar had written, in answer to his inquiry, that shortly after the subject was brought before the House, in 1873, a very intelligent and determined sub-Inspector was appointed, and very good work had been done. But that strengthened his (Mr. Dalrymple's) case, for that enterprising and active sub-Inspector had also under his charge a large portion of the Black Country, in which, he said, owing to the smallness of the inspecting body, it was impossible to overlook the numerous workshops under his charge. In one year, though he had made 2,000 visits to workshops, this sub-Inspector had not visited more than one-fourth of the entire number under his charge. There were 33,000 nailers in the district, and what was one Inspector among so many? As to half-timers, there were said to be 1,000 in the district, a figure which looked very well, but which was highly delusive, because the irregularity of attendance at school was so great. To show in one word what the inadequacy of the staff of Inspectors was, a calculation had been made that to visit 109,324 workshops would occupy $3\frac{1}{2}$ years for the present staff, at one visit to each workshop. It was needless to say that one visit in the period was entirely insufficient. It was notorious that, owing to the rarity of Inspectors' visits, advantage was taken by the people in every possible way. A gentleman well-known to him (Mr. Dalrymple), and whose evidence on the subject was quoted in 1873, and who had done all he could to bring the case of the nailers before the public, had written to him (Mr. Dalrymple) that the moment the Inspector was seen all sorts of dodges were resorted to. Boys were put in sacks, and lads under eight years were present during the visit of the Inspector, but unseen by him. There was room also for much amendment with regard to half-timers, and he considered the fine for non-attendance ought to be higher than it was. In reference to the subject generally, it was of the highest importance; and as had been said by the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella) and another hon. Member on the Opposition side of the House, no children under 10 years of age ought to be employed in the workshops, and certainly no women for more than eight hours a-day. It was terrible to think that men should be allowed to enjoy themselves in public-houses whilst women and children were allowed to work for a length of time that was most injurious to them. It was not necessary to detain the House longer, as a Royal Commission was to be appointed; but he wished especially to call the attention of the Secretary of State for the Home Department to the condition of affairs in the Black Country, and to point out the importance of instructing the Commission to have regard to the enforcement of the Acts as they stood, as a matter preliminary to any extension, or even consolidation, of the Acts. It was undesirable and mischievous that Acts should be at once unpealed and unenforced.

Mr. W. HOLMS said, that after the frank statement of the Home Secretary, he should ask the leave of the House to withdraw his Motion.

Mr. Dalrymple

DRAFTING AND REVISION OF ACTS OF PARLIAMENT.—RESOLUTION.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. FORSYTH, in rising to call the attention of the House to the language of and manner of drawing and passing Acts of Parliament, and to move a Resolution on the subject, said, the subject might not seem one of a very attractive nature, but it was nevertheless more interesting than at first sight it appeared, and one of great practical importance. The House of Commons, as a co-ordinate branch of the Legislature, existed for the purpose of legislation, and our written laws affected the liberties, the property, the rights, and the lives of all. It was therefore of the utmost importance that the laws we enacted should be plain, clear, simple, and intelligible. It was a trite maxim that everyone was bound to know the law. That was a legal fiction; yet it was undeniably true that no one could plead ignorance of the law in excuse for its violation. The principles of the Common Law were simple and clear—the difficulty lay in the application, which often was only adapted to the capacity of legal minds. But with respect to the Statute Law there ought to be no difficulty on the part of any person of ordinary understanding to comprehend it:—it ought to be as easy to construe a statute as to read a book, provided the style was clear and ordinarily intelligible—an Act of Parliament should be like a scientific book, the style clear, arrangement skilful, the language accurate, and the sentences grammatical. But we knew very well that everyone who was not a lawyer approached a Statute Book with feelings of aversion and disgust, and turned from it as from a chaotic wilderness, a labyrinth of strange phraseology and intricate construction. Many years ago a French Judge came to this country for the purpose of studying and writing upon our criminal jurisprudence. He began to write upon the subject, and the first thing he dealt with was a statute relating to our criminal jurisprudence. He dismissed the subject in these two lines—"I spare my French readers the barbarous phraseology of this species of law-making." Montesquieu, the author of Esprit des Lois, in the chapter upon the Composition of Laws, laid down certain rules which read as a satire upon our system of law-making. Montesquieu said, the style of a written law ought to be concise, simple, and direct. The Quarterly Review, in an article describing the state of English legislation, said the Legislature, instead of framing its measures with the utmost clearness, seemed to have some end to serve in involving them in the greatest possible obscurity. In order to show the importance of this subject, he would first state the number of statutes that had passed and were passing. Since the Statute of Merton in the reign of Henry III. there had been passed no less than 41,985 Acts of Parliament. Of course these were not all in existence now, but they had passed through Parliament. Of these, 18,297 were Public Acts. He came to the reign of Her present Majesty. In the reign of Queen Victoria there had been passed to the end of the last Session of Parliament 4,178 Public Acts, and of Private and Local Acts 8,089:—making the total of Acts of Parliament passed in the present reign up to the end of 1874, 12,267. We were passing every year about 100 Public Acts. Last Session of Parliament was not thought to be very prolific, but it was by no means an idle Session, 96 Public Acts and 209 Private Acts having been passed. Sir Edward Coke had quoted two Latin lines, one of which asked a question, and the other answered it—

In promptu causa est, crescit in orbe dolus.”

But the reason of the multiplicity of our laws was that Parliament dealt with such a vast variety of subjects. The House of Commons might well be compared to the trunk of an elephant, which could rend an oak and pick up a pin. To show the interest which the public felt in this matter, he might refer to two Notices which had been given by his hon. and learned Friends, the Member for West Staffordshire (Mr. Staveley Hill) and the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Rathbone), of their intention to ask the House to remedy the confused state of our legislation; and last night he received a letter from the National Chamber of Commerce thanking him for the attention which he had given to this most important subject. In a great speech made by Lord Brougham in 1848 he spoke in most severe terms of the obscurity pervading our Statute Law: he described it as totally devoid of system—all was random, chaos, and wild chance. Since that time, he admitted, there had been considerable improvement. There was less tautology, less circumlocution, less prolixity, but still a great deal of confusion, in the laws we passed. There was a deceptive brevity—brevitas esse laboro, obscurus fio. He would bear willing testimony to the ability of the learned gentleman to whom was entrusted the drawing of Bills on behalf of the Crown; but he entirely differed from him as to the plan on which they were framed. Of late years there had been a constant habit of making enactments, not by plain and distinct words expressed on the face of the Act, but by referring to other Acts passed in previous years, and by incorporating portions of preceding Acts; so that you were obliged to go back and back to those Acts to ascertain what in fact the Legislature meant. But that was a hopeless task; you became involved in a perfect chaos. There was also this habit—an Act was repealed, not bodily, but only a section or a portion of a section; and annexed to the Act with which you were dealing you found a schedule which stated what portions of former Acts were repealed, and you had to go back from Act to Act—so that even to a lawyer the task was almost hopeless. Take the case of the Public Health Act, passed in 1872. It was for the purpose, among other things, of establishing a new Sanitary Authority, and laid down the powers and duties of that Authority. How was that done? By referring to five distinct classes of Acts of Parliament—one class containing five Acts, and the whole making a total of 16 Acts of Parliament, from which you were to ascertain what were the rights, the duties, and the obligations of the new Sanitary Authority. Take another instance—that of the Church Building Acts. He believed that about 25 of that class of Acts were passed in the course of a very few years. Dr. Lushington, speaking of them, said he need not comment upon their obscurity, for that was a matter of perfect notoriety; but of one of them he said that it was entitled to pre-eminence for obscurity and difficulty of construction. In another case Vice Chancellor Kindersley said it was difficult in the last degree to discover the meaning of the Act of Parliament. He might also refer to the Merchant Shipping Acts, which commenced with the Act of 1854; since which period he did not know how many Amendment Acts had been passed. Every one of these said—"This Act is to be taken and construed as one with the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854, and all the other amending Acts." To give a notion of the sort of puzzle these statutes presented even to legal minds, he might mention that the 33rd section of the Act of 1873 repealed the 39th section of the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act of 1862, the 4th and 10th sections of the Amendment Act of 1871, and also various sections of other Amendment Acts. All these Acts were so incorporated one with another that a man must have the whole of them before him if he wished to determine any course to be pursued. He held that the proper way of amending an Act of Parliament on an important subject was to repeal it altogether and to re-enact its provisions in the new Act, with such modifications as might be necessary. This would enable everybody to ascertain within the four corners of the Act of Parliament what the law on the subject was. Numerous authorities might be cited in favour of adopting such a course, and the only possible objection to it was that all the clauses of the original measure might be opposed in Parliament. But surely, if the previous legislation ought to stand, the House of Commons would support it clause by clause, and if it required alteration they would amend it. He was very glad to learn, from the very able speech that he had recently made on the subject in the other House, that the Lord Chancellor intended, in consolidating the Patent Laws, to repeal the whole of the existing statutes, so that the whole law on the subject would be found within the four corners of his Bill. This was the way in which all amending Acts ought to be drawn. The evils of which he had spoken would almost all have been obviated if those who framed them, and those who passed them through the House, had observed certain rules mentioned by Lord Brougham. One of these rules was that a statute should never be made without careful regard to former statutes in pari materia—that one part of a statute should never contradict another statute—another that the least equivocal and the plainest terms should always be used, and that different words should never be used in the same sense; and a third was that enactments should never be made by reference to another statute. This latter rule was violated in nearly every Bill that was introduced. Lord Brougham recommended that if, to avoid greater perplexity, it became necessary to refer to another statute, careful regard should be had to the effects of the Act referred to. Supposing, however, that a Bill was admirably drawn, and that there were no mistakes in it which even a legal mind could discover, what was done in that House? After the second reading it was considered in Committee of the Whole House, and it might be "pulled in pieces," as the phrase went. Amendments were frequently introduced which conflicted with the other parts of the Bill, and which caused the greatest difficulty when the measure came to be administered as law and construed by the Judges. It might, perhaps, be argued that the mistakes made in this House might be corrected in the House of Lords. Well, it certainly was not a very dignified proceeding for the House of Commons to trust to the Upper House for the correction of its blunders. Besides, the Bill underwent the same process in the Lords, who might also commit mistakes, for aliquando bonus dormitat Homerus. Possibly it might be said it was his own fault if he did not understand particular Acts of Parliament; and therefore, in order to fortify his own statement, the hon. and learned Gentleman proceeded to quote opinions expressed by Lord Abinger, Lord Denman, Lord Campbell, the present Lord Chief Justice of England, and Mr. Justice Blackburn as to the extreme difficulty of understanding the meaning of various Acts of Parliament. In 1873 Lord Cairns, in the discussion upon the Register for Parliamentary and Municipal Elections Bill, called upon their Lordships to reject a series "of Chinese puzzles," which arose from the ambiguous phraseology of some of the clauses; and last year the Premier said he could not, and did not, understand a particular clause in the Endowed Schools Amendment Bill, which was, in fact, an extremely difficult clause to interpret. He held in his hand a list of 25 Acts of Parliament, in all of which blunders had been committed which had to be amended by subsequent Acts, and not one of those blunders would have existed if there had been proper revision and supervision after the Bills had passed through Committee. Having thus established a very strong case, he would proceed to the more difficult question—namely, the remedy. Before 1856 a Statute Law Commission was appointed, including among its members some of the most eminent legal authorities of the day—Lord Cranworth, then Lord Chancellor, Lord Lyndhurst, Lord Brougham, Lord Campbell, Lord Wensleydale, Lord Chief Justice Jervis, Mr. Walpole, Lord Westbury, and the present Lord Chief Baron. The Commissioners in their second Report, made in 1856, submitted that—and who would suggest how it should be worded, in order to carry out the intentions of Parliament? In 1857, a Select Committee was appointed for the purpose of considering so much of the second Report as had reference to the improvement of current legislation. This Committee sat for five days and examined five witnesses, but then reported that, having regard to the approaching Prorogation, they were not in a position to come to any conclusion on the subject referred to them. From that day to the present nothing had been done. Mr. Coulson, Mr. Rickards, Sir Erskine May, and Mr. Bellenden Ker were all in favour of some such plan as that he suggested—namely, that there should be a Committee of Revision and Supervision assisted by a legal officer, whose duty it would be to take care that the language of Acts of Parliament was uniform, consistent, and intelligible. This Committee would have no power to enact, but would simply take care that what Parliament meant to enact should be properly expressed. It might be said that a great burden would be thrown upon Members by the appointment of such a Committee. The work, however, would not be arduous. There might be two Committees, one appointed for the first and the other for the second three months of the Session. In this House there were some Members who never spoke, and many who seldom spoke, and they perhaps for that reason were all the more valuable—men of acuteness and business-like habits, who would be glad to serve upon a Committee of this kind. Sir Erskine May had given it as his opinion that there was at present a waste of good material which might in this way be utilized. The very existence of this Committee of Revision would make Members more cautious in the Amendments they proposed; but even if precious time were occupied in this work, it was better that time should be so spent than that legislation should be imperfect and confused. Deliberandum est diu quod statuendum est semel. In conclusion, he would express a hope that the subject would receive due consideration from the House, and that something would be done now or before long to remedy what appeared to him to be almost a public scandal. He (Mr. Forsyth) begged to move the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “a Select Committee be appointed, to be assisted by a legal officer, to whom all Public Bills passing through this House shall be referred after they have been read a second time, and again after they have been reported, with amendments, from a Committee of the whole House, and whose duty it shall be to report to the House upon each Bill as to its accuracy of language, consistency of provisions, and harmony with existing legislation,”—(Mr. Forsyth,)—instead thereof.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he readily acknowledged that the subject to which his hon. and learned Friend had with so much ability directed attention was one which deserved the gravest consideration. Both the House and the Government were under an obligation to him for having taken up the matter. Without going the whole length of the criticism which had been pronounced upon the present mode of passing Acts of Parliament, or concurring in all his hon. and learned Friend had said, he felt bound to admit that there was a great deal of foundation for it. Of course, in a large measure the inaccuracies and contradictions which were to be found in the statutes arose from the freedom of discussion which was necessary in the proceedings of Parliament. With regard to the proposal of his hon. and learned Friend, he confessed that it did not appear to him to be practicable in its present form. The Statute Law Commissioners, to whose Report of 1856 reference had already been made, recommended a different kind of tribunal from that which was now suggested. Their recommendation was, if he remembered right, that there should be an officer or Board outside Parliament to whom Bills should be referred from either of the two Houses. A Select Committee was appointed in 1857 for the purpose of having the whole question thoroughly considered; but, unfortunately, it was appointed late in the Session, and had not time to complete the heavy labour imposed upon it. The course adopted on that occasion suggested the course which it seemed to him desirable to follow at the present time. If the hon. and learned Member withdrew his Motion, he (the Attorney General) or some other Member of the Government would ask for the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the subject-matter. He was not at that moment prepared to say in what precise form of words the Committee would be moved for; but the matter would not escape his attention, and he trusted the hon. and learned Gentleman would be satisfied with this undertaking.

MR. GREGORY suggested that the evil complained of might in a great measure be remedied by a rule requiring that previous Notice should be given of Amendments to be moved in Committee.

MR. FORSYTH thankfully acceded to the suggestion of the Attorney General; and would withdraw his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—INTRODUCTION AND PROGRESS OF PUBLIC BILLS.—RESOLUTION.

MR. NEWDEGATE, in rising to move the first of three Resolutions, of which he had given Notice, as follows:—

"1. No Notice of Motion for leave to introduce a Public Bill, other than a Bill to be introduced by or on behalf of Her Majesty's Ministers, or a Bill brought from the House of Lords, shall be held to be sufficient, unless copies of such Bill have, three days previous to such Motion being made, been deposited in the Public Bill Office, or unless the Notice contain a description of the means or method by which the object of such Bill is proposed to be effected."

said: Mr. Speaker, I have on former occasions ventured to call the attention of the House to the subject, to which the suggestions contained in the Resolutions relate. The House has, on several occasions—twice, I think, during the present Parliament—expressed an opinion that it is not advisable to appoint another Committee upon the Public Business of the House. The right hon. Gentleman at the head of Her Majesty's Government, when a proposal was made by the late Government that a Committee on the Public Business of the House should be appointed, expressed in very marked terms the opinion, that it was better that the House should consider any specific suggestions for the improvement of its procedure that might be submitted, before considering the appointment of another Committee. I trust, therefore, I shall be acquitted of presumption if I venture to make some suggestions to the House. I have for this purpose given Notice in the form of three separate Resolutions, and I hope, Mr. Speaker, that you will treat them seriatim. The first Resolution suggests, that the House should adopt means to revive its former practice of exercising its discretion and its judgment upon Motions for leave to introduce Bills. The habit of admitting all Bills that may be proposed has become so general, that it is now thought to be discourteous to the hon. Member who asks leave to introduce a Bill, if leave be not granted. I do not mean that this practice is invariable, because on a recent occasion, in the case of a Bill which I myself proposed to introduce, a division was taken upon the Motion for leave to introduce it. At that time I remember saying that the practice had become so unusual as to be almost discourteous; but I never disputed the regularity of that course, though it was a proceeding much disused. In my opinion, a great part of the objects of the Motion which the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone (Mr. Forsyth) has just submitted to the House, would be accomplished by the revival of the practice that the House should and will exercise its judgment on Motions for leave to introduce Bills; because I have known too many instances in which leave has been granted for the introduction of a Bill, and yet no Bill has made its appearance for three weeks or a month after leave was granted; and upon inquiring in the offices of the House I have been informed that no manuscript had been delivered. It was perfectly obvious, therefore, that some hon. Members had obtained leave to introduce Bills without being at the pains of framing their proposals in such a manner as to render them worthy the consideration of the House before permission to introduce them was asked. Again, Sir, I am sorry to say that in the present Session there have been instances of the House having granted leave for the introduction of Bills early in February, and upon leave being granted the second readings were postponed until very distant days, in one case to a day so distant as the 7th of July. Surely, it must be obvious that a Bill in that position has little, if any, chance of being passed, and that by occupying such a place in the Order Book it stands there merely as an obstruction to proceeding with other Bills. But, Sir, I do not suggest that the House should revert exactly to the former practice, which was to require an oral statement from every hon. Member who might propose to introduce a Bill; so that there should be in all cases a previous statement, antecedent to the statement of the principle of the Bill on the Motion for the second reading. The first Resolution which I suggest is, therefore to this effect—that copies of the Bill, either in manuscript or in print, shall be deposited in the Public Bill Office three days previous to the Motion for leave being made, so as to be accessible to hon. Members of the House; or, in the alternative, if such deposit be not made, that the Notice for leave to introduce the Bill shall contain not merely, according to the present practice, a statement of the title and object of the Bill, but a statement also of the method or machinery by which the hon. Member moving for leave to introduce conceives that the object or objects of the Bill may be attained, because many Bills are introduced into this House almost without any machinery at all. The House is asked to read the Bill a second time—to sanction the mere object of the Bill, for the principle of its action is scarcely indicated, and then to hammer out for itself in Committee provisions for carrying into effect the object of the Bill. Sir, that, to my mind, manifests a failure on the part of the hon. Members who introduced the Bill; they do not show that they have given such adequate consideration to the matter as would enable them not merely to suggest the object or objects for attainment, but to suggest to the House, probably after obtaining good advice, the means by which Parliament may effectively legislate on the subject, should it see fit to do so. The House will find that the Select Committee which sat in the year 1871 adverted to the object of this my first suggestion in their 6th Resolution. That Resolution was moved by Sir John Pakington, and with the permission of the House I will read it—

“That Members, who desire to move for leave to bring in Bills, without making any explanatory statement, may give Notice of their intention to make such Motion at a quarter-past four of the clock on some future day, and then may make such Motion on such day, in the manner and at the time of making Motions for unopposed Returns, and leave shall be given for the introduction of such Bill without debate, provided no Member then objects thereto.”

That is a recognition by the Committee of 1871, that the practice of introducing Bills without explanation had prevailed to an extent which they could not approve; the Committee therefore unanimously and very properly proposed to interrupt the custom of introducing Bills without explanation, to remove from the individual Member all semblance of a privilege or right to introduce a Bill without making a statement, and for this purpose the Committee proposed to recognize the fact, that the use of that privilege is entirely at the discretion of the House in each case. Such is the intention of that Resolution. I come next to the main difficulty which the practice of bringing in Bills without an adequate exercise of discretion on the part of the House has occasioned; during the last three Sessions of Parliament this has produced a perfect block of Orders, of stages of Bills entered on the Order Book. The House will find that although the non-official Members of the House have not so much as one-third of the time of the House, they have in the course of each of the last three Sessions introduced as many measures as the Government, to whom it has been the pleasure of the House to allot full two-thirds of its time; and yet, difficulty enough is experienced by every Administration in passing a fair proportion of the Bills they introduce, although they have had two-thirds of the time of the House at their command, and all that power of combination which every Government must possess. Under such circumstances, it is simply absurd to expect that any large proportion of the Bills introduced by the non-official Members of the House, and which have been equal in number during the last three Sessions to the Bills introduced by the Government, should pass and reach the House of Lords. I say it is absurd to expect that non-official Members can pass any large proportion of this number of Bills. Some hon. Members have affirmed that these Bills embody merely the crotchets of individual Members, and that they do not contain matter which is really worthy of the attention of the House with a view to immediate legislation. I cannot deny that there is some justice in such comments; but I would ask, Mr. Speaker, whether this is not in itself a lax practice which ought to be restrained; restrained by the exercise of the discretion of the House; a discretion, the exercise of which, I humbly submit, is essential to the maintenance of the character of this House as a Legislative Assembly, essential to prevent the Order Book from being overcrowded by crude, ill-digested proposals. But this state of the Order Book is not only a misfortune, so far as the credit of the House is concerned; it goes beyond that. Among the large number of Bills introduced by the unofficial Members of the House, there are some which the House has willingly sanctioned on the second reading; but owing to the crowded state of the Order Book, especially after Whitsuntide, it has become morally impossible to carry out the intentions of the House, as expressed on the second readings of these Bills, by sending them up to the House of Lords in time to receive its approval. I have stated that the Order Book has been blocked, and with the permission of the House I will read two short calculations—rough estimates—to show that I am not misleading the House as to the manner in which its time has been distributed during the last three Sessions. I find that in the Session of 1872 the House sat 120 days, and that the average time of its sitting was 8 hours and 33 minutes per day. In the Session of 1873 the House sat 112 days, and the average time of its sitting was 7 hours and 50 minutes per day. The following Session in 1874 was exceptional. There had been a change of Government, and, practically, the House left its legislative business to a considerable extent in abeyance, until the present Ministry should have had the opportunity of duly considering and of bringing forward the measures they contemplated. In the Session of 1874, then, the House sat 97 days, and the average time of its sitting was 7 hours and 20 minutes per day. How was the time of the House distributed? I will take, first, an average week in the ordinary course of proceeding, when the House meets at 4 o'clock on four days in the week, and on Wednesday at 12. On Monday, a Government day, 8 hours; available for opposed Orders, 7 hours. Tuesday, Notices of Motion and unofficial Orders, 8 hours; available for opposed Orders, 3 hours. Wednesday, unofficial Orders, 6 hours; available for opposed Orders, 5½ hours. Thursday, a Government day, 8 hours; available for opposed Orders, 7 hours. Friday, Notices on Supply and Government Orders afterwards, 8 hours; available for opposed Orders, 3 hours. The average for the week is, therefore, 38 hours; of which 25½ hours were available for opposed Orders, and 8½ hours for unofficial Orders. Thus the Government had 17 hours in the week available for Opposed Business, while unofficial Members had 8½ hours. But the House will bear in mind that a great change has been introduced by the adoption of Morning Sittings, which have commenced sometimes so early as the 27th of May, when not much more than one-half the Session has elapsed. What, then, is the state of things as to time during the prevalence of these Morning Sittings? How is our time divided between Her Majesty's Government and the unofficial Members of this House? Under these circumstances, the House meets at 2 o'clock in the afternoon, suspends the sitting at 7, and resumes at 9. On Monday the sitting would be 10½ hours; available for opposed Government Business, 9½ hours. On Tuesday the sitting would be 10½ hours; available for Opposed Government Business, 4½ hours; and for unofficial Orders, 1 hour. On Wednesday the sitting would be 6 hours; available for unofficial business, $5\frac{1}{2}$ hours. On Thursday the sitting would be $10\frac{1}{2}$ hours; available for Government Business, $9\frac{1}{2}$ hours. On Friday the sitting would be $10\frac{1}{2}$ hours; available for Government Business, 6 hours. The general result would be, that during the Morning Sittings the House would sit 48 hours per week, of which $29\frac{1}{2}$ hours, available for Opposed Orders, are appropriated by the Government, and only $6\frac{1}{2}$ hours were available for unofficial Orders. According to the calculation, in the ordinary state of things, when the House has not adopted Morning Sittings, the unofficial Members have half the time available for Opposed Orders; but, when the Morning Sittings are appointed, they appear to have between one-fourth and one-fifth of the time. It may, therefore, be fairly assumed, that of the whole time of the Session available for Opposed Orders, the unofficial Members have, on the average, less than one-third—in other words, the Government have double the time that the unofficial Members possess—and yet the number of Bills for the last three Sessions introduced by the unofficial Members has been equal to the number introduced by the Government. This proportion may, however, be affected so far as to Government time for their Orders by Supply, and Financial Statements; but the time occupied by Motions by way of Amendment to Supply, made by unofficial Members, may be taken as a set-off, and probably balance the deduction from the Government's time for Orders. I think, therefore, I am justified in stating, that, on the average of the Session, the Government have double the time for their Bills, which is available for the unofficial Bills. Let me now glance at the number of Bills which were introduced respectively by Ministers and by unofficial Members. The total number of Bills introduced in the House of Commons, including Bills brought from the Lords, during the Session of 1872, was 240; of this number, 120 were Government Bills, and 120 non-official Bills. The official Bills passed were 92, and 1 was rejected on division; the total dealt with by the House being 93, whilst there were withdrawn or discharged—that is, not dealt with by the House—27. Then, of the 120 non-official Bills, 30 were passed, 18 were rejected on divisions; making a total of 48 dealt with by the House, whilst 72 were dropped, discharged, and laid aside; in other words, not dealt with by the House. Thus showing that, of the 120 official Bills, three-fourths were passed, and scarcely one-fourth abandoned; and that of the 120 non-official Bills, only one-fourth were passed, and nearly seven-twelfths were abandoned. In the following Session, 1873, the Government introduced 119 Bills, and non-official Members 120 Bills. Of the 119 official Bills 91 were passed, and 2 rejected on divisions, the total dealt with by the House being 93: and the number withdrawn or discharged—that is, not dealt with by the House, was 26. Of the 120 non-official Bills there were passed 26, and rejected on divisions 16; the number dealt with by the House being 42, while there were withdrawn, discharged, and dropped—not dealt with by the House—78. Thus, out of 119 official Bills, three-fourths were passed and scarcely one-fourth abandoned; whereas of the 120 non-official Bills about one-fourth only were passed, and nearly eight-twelfths were abandoned. Let me now take the Session of 1874. In that Session 202 Bills were introduced, of which 101 were Government Bills, and 101 non-official. The number of official Bills passed was 88, and 1 was referred to a Select Committee; the total dealt with by the House being 89. There were withdrawn, discharged, and dropped—that is, not dealt with by the House, 12. Of the 101 non-official Bills 23 were passed, and 17 were rejected on divisions, together 40; whilst 61 were withdrawn, discharged, or dropped—that is, were not dealt with by the House. So that of the 101 official Bills, more than three-fourths were passed, and scarcely one-eighth abandoned; whereas, of the 101 non-official Bills, about one-fifth only were passed; while six-tenths were abandoned. If any one, Sir, will take the trouble to look at the Order Book, I think he will come to the conclusion that the practice of allowing Bills to be introduced, which have not the slightest prospect of being passed, has been carried to great excess. By reviving the old practice of the House, by treating the Motion for leave as a substantive Motion, not as a matter of mere form, you do not debar hon.

Members from bringing in the substance of their proposals by way of Resolution, and taking the sense of the House on the subjects they would thereby introduce. Leave to introduce a Bill can only be obtained by a Motion; why should not the House, upon that Motion, having ascertained the character of the Bill, express an opinion not merely upon the merits of the Bill itself, but also upon the fitness of the proposal to occupy a place on the Order Book, to the interruption of the passing of other measures, and so to occupy the attention of this great Assembly on repeated occasions? For, remember, that when the House grants leave for the introduction of a Bill, it grants leave to the hon. Member in charge of it to appropriate to the consideration of the subject which he introduces, a portion—perhaps no inconsiderable portion—of the time of the House. I regret that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) is incapacitated by ill-health from being in his place this evening, for I have reason to believe that this subject has engaged his attention. I think I can show, from a public declaration on his part, that he is convinced that unless the House again insists upon the exercise of its discretion with regard to subjects which are to be brought under its attention, which are to occupy its time, gradually the House will lose all command over the time appropriated by it to the Business of unofficial Members. In the year 1873, I moved for the appointment of a Select Committee on Public Business, so far as the time appropriated to the Government and to unofficial Members respectively. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich was then Prime Minister, and in reply to my observations thus spoke—

“While private Members squabbled with the Government, and the Government with private Members, the cardinal difficulty lay in the quantity of Business and the fixed quantity of time to do it in, and it was to the economical distribution of that time to which the House would have to look, rather than to any great advantage to be gained by private Members at the expense of the Government.”—[3 Hansard, ccxv. 240.]

Colonel Wilson-Patten, now Lord Winmarleigh, followed in the same debate, and used these expressions—

“The other day he counted the number of Bills awaiting discussion which had been brought in by hon. Members. He found there were no fewer than 66 Bills on the Order Book.” Colonel Wilson-Patten was speaking on the 27th of March. It is now only the 19th of February, yet the Bills introduced by hon. Members already exceed 66. Colonel Wilson-Patten went on to say—

“He had not counted the Notices of Motion, but they were very numerous. It was clearly impossible that all of them could be considered and passed through their various stages in the time at the disposal of the House. The truth was, that the measures introduced by private Members impeded each other, and would continue to do so under any system that had been suggested. The only thing that would facilitate the passage of a portion of them would be the withdrawal of the rest. . . . Business had so increased that its discharge was almost impossible under any rules, unless, as he had stated, hon. Members whose Bills had no chance of passing, would at once withdraw them—a course, however, which it was hopeless to expect, every hon. Member naturally thinking his own Bill an important one.”—[Ibid. 242-3.]

Having given to the House the opinion of the late Prime Minister, and of a Peer who was at one time the Chairman of our Committees, and was ever distinguished by the assiduous ability with which he applied himself to the Business of this House, I appeal to non-official Members themselves who have observed the state of Business during the last three Sessions, whether Colonel Wilson-Patten was not right, when he said that Bills which as they must see have no chance of passing, ought either not to be introduced, or ought to be withdrawn in good time? It is strange that so great an Assembly as this should submit to have its time during a third of the time of the Session embarrassed by the inconvenience, the hap-hazard, of an overcrowded Order Book.—I have hitherto been speaking upon the 1st Resolution in my Notice. By the 2nd Resolution I propose to apply the principle of Lord Redesdale's Resolution, which has long been adopted by the House of Lords, with respect to Bills sent up from this House too late in the Session for their adequate consideration by the House of Lords. Lord Redesdale claimed for the House of Lords the exercise of a discretion as to whether they would entertain any of these Bills after a certain date in the Session. I propose that this House should claim the same kind of discretion in the terms of this Resolution by declaring—

"That no Order for any stage of such Bill shall be appointed for any day more than a month from the date of the previous stage of such Bill, with a view to the further consideration of such Bill during the Session, unless the House, by special Resolution, of which the usual notice shall have been given, shall otherwise direct."

We have already a Rule that no hon. Member shall be permitted to give a Notice of Motion further forward than a month from the day on which he may obtain leave to introduce it; and why should we not apply the principle of that Rule to the stages of Bills? Why should we countenance such a practice as that when a Member has, in February, obtained leave to introduce a Bill, which is always granted upon the presumption that he hopes it may pass into law, he should, as in a case we have before us, be allowed to appoint the second reading for so late a day as the 7th of July? It is almost a moral impossibility that this Bill should become law, were it to obtain the sanction of this House. But there is a further objection to this practice, and this is—that the Bill, which so stands for second reading on the 7th of July, obstructs the passage of other Bills in their latter stages which the House has approved and desires to see passed. This is a matter, however, in reference to which I think the House should not adopt as an absolute rule that no stage of a Bill shall hereafter be appointed for a day later than a month; but should declare that if any of the stages of any particular Bill are to be appointed further forward than a month from the date of its introduction, or its last previous stage, then Notice should be given to the House that an application will be made for permission, so that a further postponement of any stage of such Bill shall be the special act of the House according to its discretion, and not be considered in any sense within the privilege of the individual Member who has charge of the Bill. The third suggestion is, I have been told, rather too comprehensive. It is in these terms—

"No such Bill shall be appointed for Second Reading after the Whitsuntide Recess unless the House"—acting on the principle of Lord Redesdale's Resolution—"by special Resolution, of which the usual Notice shall have been given, direct that such Bill be appointed for Second Reading at a later period of the Session."

Now, the object of the Resolution is this—It has been deemed expedient that the House should entrust to Her Majesty's Ministers' to the Executive the origination of by far the greater part of the legislation which is submitted to this House. I have shown that on the average of two Sessions—namely, 1872 and 1873—the Government introduced in round numbers 120 Bills, and that they passed three-fourths of them; but it has become the invariable practice that before Whitsuntide, whoever may be Ministers of the Crown, should declare which of their Bills then standing on the Order Book they intend to proceed with, and which to withdraw. My 3rd Resolution—or, rather, I should say, suggestion—proposes that the House should, before Whitsuntide, exercise a similar discretion with respect to those Orders and Bills standing in the Order Book that have been introduced by the non-official Members. I have thought, and thought deeply, whether it would be possible for non-official Members to act separately from the Government, but together among themselves, in the regulation of their business. I am convinced that this is impossible, and that it is only by calling upon the House itself in the aggregate to decide at its discretion which Bills shall be proceeded with after Whitsuntide, and which Bills shall be arrested or withdrawn, that we are likely so to clear the Order Book as to enable the House to carry out its intentions with respect to the Bills it has not only allowed to be introduced, but has approved after their introduction. The House could thus relieve itself from the difficulties caused by an overcrowded Order Book, relieve itself of having to debate Bill after Bill, introduced by hon. Members with no reasonable expectation that, after all this waste of time, after the trouble they give the House at large, these Bills will at any reasonable period, if ever, become law. These suggestions are, I hope, not extravagant; and I trust the House will remember that it is only after a Committee on Public Business has been repeatedly refused, and last refused when I myself moved its appointment, that I have ventured to lay these suggestions before the House. I have now been a Member of this House for more than 30 years; I was a Member of the Select Committee on the Public Business of this House which sat in 1861, and again

I was a Member of the Committee on Public Business in 1871, and as the result of this experience I humbly submit to the House these suggestions for relieving the unofficial Members and the House from a real difficulty. I do not deny that there are advantages in having subjects for legislation submitted to the House in the form of Bills; I believe that the exertion of attempting to reduce the matter into legislative form has a wholesome effect upon the hon. Member who desires to occupy the attention of the House; for this exertion is calculated to dispel chimerical expectations and ideas in himself and in others, which may have been excited by glowing declamation; becoming acquainted with the difficulty of practical legislation may sober many who might otherwise indulge in wild exaggeration, may induce them calmly to consider the practicability of compliance with their demands. But if this advantage is to be obtained, the Bills must be well framed, so drawn as to be worthy of being submitted to this House; we should thus escape those specimens of crude legislation, which too often absorb and waste the time allowed to the unofficial Members by this House. It is far better that the House should consider each Bill, each proposal at the initial step, and if any hon. Member does not produce evidence that he is competent to submit a feasible framework of a measure for legislation, the House should not allow him to occupy a position on the Order Book with his Bill, which thus wastes time and becomes obstructive of other measures. I thank the House for allowing me to submit these suggestions to its notice. I can assure you, Sir, that out-of-doors this subject has attracted considerable attention. I have always entertained an earnest desire to contribute, however humbly, to the maintenance of the high character of the House, and to the efficient discharge of its duties; and it is with that feeling that I submit to the House the 1st Resolution, which I have now the honour to move.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "no Notice of Motion for leave to introduce a Public Bill, other than a Bill to be introduced by or on behalf of Her Majesty's Ministers, or a Bill brought from the House of Lords, shall be held to be sufficient, unless copies of such

Bill have, three days previous to such Motion being made, been deposited in the Public Bill Office, or unless the Notice contain a description of the means or method by which the object of such Bill is proposed to be effected,"—(Mr. Newdegate.)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, my hon. Friend in introducing these Resolutions has referred to an observation of my own made, I believe, last Session, in which, while expressing an opinion that it was not expedient that the Committee on Public Business should be again appointed, I thought it advisable that individual Members should offer to the House any suggestions for the improved management of our business. I am not surprised that my hon. Friend the Member for North Warwickshire should have undertaken the task, for few hon. Members have given so much attention to the transaction of Public Business as himself, and he has, I believe, sat on more than one Select Committee whose recommendations have obtained the sanction of the House. At the same time, I may state that, looking at these Resolutions, and occupying the position which I do at this moment, I can view them with impartiality, because these Resolutions, although in effect they propose that great alterations should be made in the mode of conducting Public Business, and although they make restrictions in the conduct of private Members, yet they do not apply to Her Majesty's Government. With regard to these three Resolutions, I would make three remarks. As to that which would require copies of Bills to be deposited in the Public Bill Office three days previous to their announcement in this House, I would ask the House to consider what a remarkable alteration that would make in the initiation of business. The House can hardly have forgotten that on the first night of our meeting there were nearly 50 Notices, the majority of which related to Bills involving proposed legislation; and, in fact, the business of the Session can be well indicated on the first night; but that would not be possible if this Resolution were adopted, for not a single Notice could be given on the first night of the meeting of the House.

When the House has been in Prorogation for a long time, the House naturally expects some expression of opinion on the part of hon. Members as to the subjects which require legislation or notice; but under this Resolution the first night of the Session would be a dull and silent ceremony, without the slightest echo of any feeling in the public mind, or any recognition of the pulse of public opinion, such as would be expressed by the meeting of a great popular Assembly under circumstances of considerable expectation, and when Parliament has been opened perhaps by the Sovereign herself. I now come to the second Resolution, which, as it seems to me, would practically add another stage to every Bill. While these Resolutions are brought forward to hoard the time of the House, and to prevent any unnecessary expenditure of that important element, this Resolution, so far as I can collect, would increase in number the stages of a Bill, which, though many think them too numerous, I am not prepared in any way to diminish, though I think they are ample to secure the liberties of the country. The third Resolution appears to me to be of a very peculiar character; the practical effect of it is an early Prorogation of Parliament for private Members. [Laughter.] That really would be the consequence of that Resolution. Certainly, the feature of these Resolutions is increased restriction. What is the ground on which my hon. Friend thinks it necessary to bring forward this code of restriction on our proceedings? It appears to be this—the official Members and the unofficial Members, generally speaking, propose an equal amount of legislation every year. Say, for example, 120 Bills are proposed by official Members and the same number by unofficial Members. The result is, that the official Members pass 100 of their 120, and the unofficial Members pass 20 of their 120. My hon. Friend seems to think that that is a very great evil—not that the Government measures are passed; he wishes them to be; he says that the Government have double the time of unofficial Members, and he does not grudge them it; but he says it is a great evil that the unofficial Members should have the privilege of introducing 120 Bills and passing only 20. I am not so clear that that is a great evil. In the first place, you must look at the essential difference between Bills brought in by a responsible Government and Bills that are brought in by independent and irresponsible legislators. Generally speaking, no Bill is brought forward by a Government that is not to a certain extent called for by public convenience and public necessity; but Bills brought forward by those who are not responsible in that light, by those who are described by the hon. Gentleman as unofficial Members, are generally Bills that are essentially of a tentative character. It is very true that many Bills are brought forward in this House by hon. Gentlemen who do not contemplate their being passed, and do not even wish them to be; they are convinced, their constituencies are convinced, or some party or section of the country is convinced that legislation is necessary upon these subjects; they prepare Bills, and create a public opinion and hope in time to pass laws, the beneficial character of which is ultimately acknowledged. But that is a process which is necessarily peculiar to an Assembly like the present; it does not appear to me to be necessarily disadvantageous; and I am not at all prepared to say to the unofficial Members—as my hon. Friend's proposition practically does—"You are to be so tied and so restricted that, in fact, you shall be allowed to bring in only 20 Bills, with the prospect that you shall then be able to carry them." I cannot think that any alteration of that kind is at all needed. My hon. Friend says he objects very much to the practice of introducing Bills of which there is no prospect of their being passed in the Session; and he is in favour of the House making more use of that stage of the Bill in which the Member asks leave to bring in the Bill, so that they may decide upon that occasion whether the Bill should or should not be brought in. I have very great doubt whether that would be an expedient course. It is very difficult to decide upon a question, which is complicated enough to require legislation, on the mere statement of an hon. Member; that may be as clear as possible; when you see the means by which he proposes to carry out his suggestions you find that some of them are inconsistent and impracticable; and until you have the Bill really before you, I do not think it is possible to form anything like a sedate opinion on his proposal. On these grounds alone, I am against the opinions which have been indicated by my hon. Friend. I know I shall be considered heretical in what I say; but I confess, referring to my own experience, which is longer even than the 30 years of my hon. Friend, I am not of opinion that there is too little legislation in this House. I think there is enough — there is sufficient, and it is sufficiently well grounded — and, although Acts of Parliament are not drawn up with the strict laws of literary composition, and although a Judge may, perhaps in a moment of irritation, due to the heated atmosphere of a crowded Court, occasionally sneer at our labours, and at an expression in some of our productions, I doubt very much whether, considering the kind of legislation which goes on, and the difficulty and complexity of the subjects which we have to encounter, results as favourable as we accomplish can be paralleled in any other Assembly in any other country. I really wish the House to give their opinion, and I do not wish in any way to dictate my own. The Resolutions do not affect the conduct of the Business of the Government, they concern the unofficial and independent Members. If they are prepared for increased restrictions—if they are prepared to give more time to Her Majesty's Ministers, I can only say that any boon of that kind will be received on our part with the utmost courtesy and gratitude. I wish hon. Members to understand that the observations I have made have reference to their interests, and not to those of the Government. I have a high respect for my hon. Friend. He could not have arrived at these Resolutions without much thought, research, and experience; but from what I know of attempts to deal with the procedure and conduct of Business in this House, I have come to the conclusion that, though, no doubt, there are changes which on happy occasions we may avail ourselves of, the general rules upon which our procedure is based are sound and beneficial.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN said, the fact that there had already been two discussions this Session in regard to the arrangements affecting independent Members proved that those arrangements were not entirely satisfactory. Now that the half-past 12 rule had been adopted in all its rigour, private Members had no opportunity to carry through the House a Bill which was the subject of serious discussion. That was more especially the case, when it was recollected that Bills of private Members were brought forward after midnight—no opportunity offering for them to introduce them at an earlier time of the night. Last Session, by an elaborate calculation, he ascertained that the time at the disposal of independent Members who had introduced Bills did not average more than 43 minutes and a few seconds. On the first night of that Session, 40 hon. Members sat for five or six weary hours, each having in his hand a paper with a bit of green riband round it. A more dismal set of objects it was impossible to conceive, and the agony they endured while they sat looking at each other was enough for the rest of the Session. With regard to the first Resolution, he came down rather prepared to support it; but after hearing the speech of his hon. Friend, he felt bound to oppose it. If adopted, it would cause three discussions on the principle of a Bill instead of two; and, therefore, so far from expediting, it would retard the progress of a measure. He could not see much objection to the second Resolution; but to the third, and by far the most important of the Resolutions, he must offer his most strenuous opposition. If that Resolution were carried, the result would be that only one-half of the Bills introduced by private Members would ever reach a second reading. The County Franchise Bill had been put down for the 7th of July, because, before Notice could be given of its introduction, every Wednesday in the Order Book up to that date was already full; and if the rule of the House were in accordance with that Resolution, it could never be read a second time at all. As the Prime Minister had pointed out, if private Members under the present system did not succeed in legislation, they got discussion. A subject was thoroughly ventilated in the House and discussed in the public journals, and thus became ripe for legislation. It was in that way that the Factory Bill of last Session, though brought in by a private Member, was, after discussion, judiciously taken up by the Government, and formed one of the few legislative results of the Session. In the same way he did not despair of the Burials Bill being taken up by some Government and passed into law.

MR. ANDERSON considered the Resolutions entirely impracticable. If the first were adopted, another Resolution would be necessary, requiring that only a certain number of Bills should be introduced in any one night. There would be a rush on the first night of the Session to get the Bills printed, and there would be so many to get printed and distributed and read, that it would be impossible to comply with the conditions laid down, or for hon. Members, under those conditions, to make themselves acquainted with the nature and the provisions of the Bills which were introduced. The second and third Resolutions would, in fact, add two more stages to those which already stood between the introduction of the Bill of a private Member and its passing. There were too many obstacles already, and he was not inclined to add to their number.

MR. DILLWYN approved of the first Resolution. Under the present system, Bills jostled each other too much to permit of their proper consideration. He thought the great evil of the present system was that, all Bills being introduced without discussion, became Orders, and thus the Order Book was too crowded after Easter; but these Resolutions would ensure many Bills being disposed of before Easter. The House would thus have more serious work before Easter, and lighter work after Easter.

(Mr. Sclater-Booth, Mr. Clare Read.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that the first Act upon this subject was passed in 1860, and was rendered necessary by the frequent complaints of purchasers from retail tradesmen, of the injury to which they were subjected by the prevalence of adulteration. That Act was in operation for 12 years, when it was entirely re-cast, partly under the auspices of his noble Friend (Lord Eustace Cecil) near him, and the question was then mixed up in a great degree with sanitary considerations. In the second Act authority was given to institute proceedings, and the appointment of an analyst was made quasi-compulsory on the authorities, who had to do with it, and the law had a sanitary object. The language of the Act was founded on the idea of adulteration, which was to be prohibited, not only because it was a fraud upon the purchaser, but also because it was an injury done to the community. But the Act was soon found to be attended in its working with serious difficulties, partly caused by the want of any definition of the word "adulteration" in the Bill. Judges differed, and magistrates were unable to understand what was exactly meant by the word. Again, as regarded some of the most important operative clauses there was a failure of justice, and, on the other hand, the Act caused heart-burnings and sometimes led to very serious cases of hardship and even injustice. With respect to the article of tea particularly strong complaints were made, and when he acceded to his present office he found a general opinion that though the Act was of so recent a date the time had arrived for reconsidering it. Consequently, about a year ago, he asked the House to appoint a Select Committee with a view to some amendments during the last Session of Parliament, and the House was pleased to accede to his proposal. He stated to the House at that time that his object in proposing the Select Committee was to mitigate the hardships which were undoubtedly imposed on traders in many cases by the law as it stood, but still more to facilitate and make plain the operation of the law so that the advantages which the public unquestionably possessed by the existence of those Acts might be preserved to it unimpaired. It was not, therefore, the intention of the Government that the securities to the community should be in any respect broken down. The Committee found their labours grew upon them, time went on, and the Report was not in his hand early enough to enable legislation to be pressed on last year. Having to consider the matter during the Recess, the first question was, whether the new Bill should be laid down on the same lines as the old, and whether the same language should be used in its operative clauses. The experienced draftsman to whom the preparation of the Bill was entrusted, had the recommendations of the Select Committee before him, but found it impossible with satisfaction to himself or with any assistance which he (Mr. Selater-Booth) could give, to frame such a definition of the word "adulteration" as could be relied upon as the basis of permanent legislation on the subject. The consequence was, that what would be regarded as the operative clauses of the Bill had been drawn up in a different way, and an attempt had been made to lay down in the clauses the things exactly prohibited and the exceptions which might fairly release the trader from penalty. By an unfortunate error of the printer, with which the draftsman had nothing to do, the measure was still an Adulteration of Food Bill, but it was obvious that its title should be "The Sale of Food and Drugs Bill." The Bill was arranged in five parts; it described the offences prohibited, laid down rules for the appointment and duties of analysts, and regulated the proceedings against offenders; then there were some special provisions with regard to certain offences, and some important clauses with reference to the new duties imposed on those who were to carry out the measure. It prohibited under heavy penalties the admixture with food and drugs of any ingredients injurious to health, or the sale of any article not of the nature or quality demanded by the purchaser, with certain exceptions. Opinions might vary as to the value of the list of exceptions which had been made, but in Committee he would be happy to hear what might be said on the subject, and accept of Amendments which might appear to be reasonable. He wished that every security should be given to the public, but so that the reproach which had been cast upon Parliament for not removing certain hardships which existed could no longer be used. A new provision, which was very much required, had been added—in effect, that the interference with some articles so as to affect its quality should be subject to penalty. Under this provision, the offence of selling milk which had a portion of its nutritious qualities taken away from it would be rendered penal. The Bill also provided that where there was an article which was sold mixed with something else for the convenience of the buyer and the seller equally, the mixture should be in proper proportions; and in the event of a legal question arising, it would be for the seller to show there was no excess of one ingredient to the disadvantage of the buyer. Under the old Act, the seller of retailed articles was obliged to declare orally to his customers if there had been any admixture. That provision had been seriously complained of, and it was obvious that in any shop where a large business was done, this express notice could not be given or insisted on. It was therefore now proposed that it would be sufficient if a label stating the fact was affixed to the article. The Select Committee had recommended, as against the practice of the existing law, that the appointment of analysts should be made compulsory on the authorities. But there were objections to such a course, and it seemed to him (Mr. Selater-Booth) that they were not in a position to go so far. In the first place, the number of candidates for these appointments was not very considerable, and great difficulty had been experienced in getting competent analysts. Then, though you might make an authority appoint an officer, you could not without stringent legislation make him put the officer in motion. He knew from the experience he had in other branches of administration how easy it was to make a colourable appointment, and then to take care that the person appointed should not do that which the law contemplated. Further, he did not think it advisable that the appointments should be too numerous, if a smaller number would be sufficient. It was clearly desirable that a small borough, for instance, should have inducements held out to appoint the same person as had been appointed in a large borough or town in the same county to discharge the duties, rather than to have separate analysts for each separate town. It had been recommended by the Committee that in the event of a trader refusing to allow an article to be carried off for analysis, the policeman might seize the article on tendering to him its money value. Government, however, thought that somewhat too strong, but they thought they would meet the justice of the case if they made the refusal to supply samples for analysis an offence under the Act. The report of the analyst would be prima facie evidence to support the charge, and the obligation to disprove it would be upon the tradesman. As a matter of common justice, the dealer and his wife would be admitted to give evidence at their trial, and he thought that when they were examined before magistrates accustomed to deal with such questions, a just decision would be arrived at. This led him to a provision to which he had given anxious consideration—namely, that if the defendant in any prosecution produced a warrant of the purity of the article from the person of whom he had bought it, and also proved to the satisfaction of the justices that he sold it in the same state as when it came into his hands, he should be discharged. In another part of the Bill there was a penalty provided for the forgery of any such warranty. There had been some consideration whether they should not proceed against a man who gave a false or incorrect warranty; but they had, after a time, abandoned that idea, inasmuch as it would be bringing into a Court of summary jurisdiction a matter which, possibly, could only be dealt with by another tribunal. Proceedings, however, might be taken by the seller against the person who had given such a warrant, in the event of the article proving to be adulterated. The fines obtained from prosecutions would in future go to the authorities who were charged with the carrying out of the Act, instead of to the police, and it was hoped that this would prove an inducement to those authorities to have the provisions of the Act strictly enforced. As a great many of the prosecutions which had been instituted under the present Act had reference to the adulteration of tea, power was given to the Customs to have that article analysed on its arrival in this country, and, as a rule, the adulteration taking place abroad, he thought, although he was not too sanguine in the matter, that soon they would hear little about the adulteration of tea. The retail dealer would still have to look out for himself, and there could, he thought, be no objection to that, inasmuch as it was for the public good. The Report of the Committee stated that the old Acts had been the means of much good, not only directly, but also indirectly; and if the present Bill came into operation he was satisfied that the system of adulteration of food and drugs, which was a great scandal not many years ago, would soon be reduced within very narrow limits. Already analysts had been appointed in 34 out of 54 counties; and he had no doubt that under the present Bill, the number of such appointments would be largely increased. The Committee were strongly of opinion that mixtures of coffee, cocoa, mustard, &c., which were expressly labelled as mixtures, should be allowed for the sake of the public taste, and their recommendation on this point had been adopted in the Bill. If the consumer desired those articles mixed, and they were harmless, there seemed no reason for prohibiting their sale. At prosecutions it would not be necessary for the analyst to attend, unless his presence was expressly desired, and samples for analysis might be sent through the post. A body of gentlemen representing the public analysts had, he was happy to say expressed approval of the general principles of the Bill, though, of course, they had suggestions to make in their own interest, some of which he should be able to accept. He hoped the local authorities would take steps to secure prompt execution of the Bill in case it passed into law, and at the same time to ensure fair hearings for all persons concerned in cases of prosecution. The measure would tend, he believed, to facilitate the conduct of proceedings before the local authorities—to enable proceedings to be conducted with greater speed, less hindrance, and fewer technical objections before the magistrates—and would tend greatly to the public advantage; and if that result could be attained it would be doing a great deal. The Bill, though not of first-rate importance, was nevertheless one in which great public interest had been taken. It had been prepared by a person of great skill and practice in these matters, and its provisions had all been very carefully considered. Still, he was far from saying that some of the clauses were not open to Amendment in Committee. Several Amendments had been placed upon the Paper, and these should receive the best consideration; but he hoped to be able to maintain the principle of the measure as affecting the security of the public, and to remove the reproach that existing legislation was gratuitously injurious to the interests of trade. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Selater-Booth.)

MR. SANDFORD said, he had not read the Bill with unmitigated pleasure. It was framed, he thought, rather in the interest of the wholesale dealer, than in the interest of the public; and his impression was, that if passed in its present form, it would lead very considerably to the adulteration of food. Twenty-two years ago he had something to do with the passing of an Act on the subject. At that time, there was no doubt that the public were not only cheated, to use the classical language of the Secretary of the Board of Trade, but they were also poisoned; and if, at the present moment, they were only cheated, and not poisoned, they were very much indebted to legislation on this subject. He must, therefore look with considerable alarm on any measure that would lead to a restoration of the old state of things. His right hon. Friend said, in his opening speech, that the great grievance at the present moment was that adulteration was not properly defined. Well, his right hon. Friend did not attempt in this Bill to define adulteration. Therefore he left unredressed, and without any attempt to redress, that which he admitted to be the great grievance of the present state of things. When they came to what his right hon. Friend described as the main clauses of the Bill—namely, the 5th and 6th—they found that in order to procure the conviction of a person who sold adulterated goods, it must be proved that he had full knowledge that they were adulterated. Now, it was notorious that when proof of such knowledge was required, it was impossible to get a conviction. It was impossible to prove a man's knowledge of the adulterated character of the goods which he sold. But he passed on to Clause 7, because that, as the Bill at present stood, was the single clause under which you could obtain a conviction. Well, what did the 7th clause say? It said that no person should sell an article mixed for any of the purposes mentioned in the exceptions before set forth, if the matter mixed was more than was ordinarily required for the purpose; so that you would have to consider Clause 7 in connection with some previous exceptions. It would be most perplexing for any magistrate to decide upon Clause 7. We all knew that what was necessary in dealing with this subject was, that the poor man should be protected—that when he believed he was buying a wholesome article of food, he ought to be protected against the sale of an unwholesome article. But if a poor man bought an article, he (Mr. Sandford) did not see how he would be protected under the Bill. The Bill said that dealers should offer goods for sale according to the "usages of the trade." But how was a poor man to know what was the usage of trade when he bought an article? Another objectionable feature of the Bill was, that it left the appointment of analysts in the hands of town councils. When he sat on the Committee that inquired into the subject, persons complained, perhaps with justice, that they were condemned upon what they believed to be not sufficient evidence—that the persons who had been appointed to analyze did not possess sufficient knowledge for the purpose. Therefore he contended that in amending the Act, the first thing you should do was to provide that a better description of analysts should be appointed, and that their number should be reduced. He believed that if England were divided into three or four portions, and one able analyst were appointed for each of those divisions, that number of analysts would be quite sufficient. He examined almost every witness upon that point, and they told him, he believed unanimously, that almost every article could be sent to an analyst, no matter how distant, from one end of England to another. He was not going to mention names; but he would say that in certain towns, analysts were appointed with the express understanding that they should take no action against any person in the town. If you considered for a moment of what persons the municipal council, especially in large towns, was to a great extent composed, you would perceive that they were the very class of persons to be proceeded against. Therefore, he thought the appointment of analysts ought not to be left in their hands.

Mr. Selater-Booth

There was no doubt that the Act had pressed hardly upon some retail dealers, and he thought it was of very great importance that retail dealers should be enabled in some more expeditious way to proceed against wholesale dealers for having sold to them adulterated goods. But if the House wished to put down adulteration, if they wished at the same time not to press heavily upon retail dealers, the persons whom they ought to endeavour to punish were the wholesale dealers. Now, if one class of persons was favoured more than another by this Bill, it was the wholesale dealers. He came to another point—the inspection of tea in bond. He was opposed, in the Committee, to an inspection of tea in bond, and he would tell them why. He did not like to throw that duty on the Government. He thought it was the duty of the wholesale dealer to take care that he did not import an adulterated article. Wholesale dealers were not such poor people that they could not pay the expense of an inspection of goods which they imported into this country, in order to ascertain whether they were adulterated or not. He thought that on them lay the responsibility of not introducing into this country an adulterated article. If the system of inspecting tea was to be introduced, why was inspection to be confined to tea? If the system of inspection of tea was to be introduced, the principle should be extended to every article of food. Under the present Act, adulteration had been reduced to a minimum quantity; but if they were going to return to the old state of things, and to require knowledge on the sale of adulterated articles, then he said they were going to re-establish the state of things which existed 22 years ago, and which shocked the public when it was exposed before the Committee that sat. He was quite sure his right hon. Friend would be only too anxious to attend to any suggestions that might be made. He would venture to put on the Paper some Amendments which would embody the observations he had made, and he had only to request that his right hon. Friend would not fix too early a day for going into Committee on the Bill.

Mr. MUNTZ said, he had not the slightest intention of opposing the second reading of the Bill; but he joined in the request that the Government would give as much time as possible for the consideration of the measure, so that hon. Members might be able to confer with those who were more especially interested in the subject, and to ascertain what was really wanted to meet the wishes of the public and of dealers. He observed that the Bill contained a clause specially providing that the Bill should not apply to Scotland in Ireland. He could not understand why that clause was inserted. The working of the Act seemed to give satisfaction in Ireland. Dr. Cameron, the analyst for Dublin, was decidedly in favour of the Act, and if he (Mr. Muntz) remembered right, that gentleman stated that before the Act was put in operation in Dublin the "usage of trade" amongst the milk-sellers was, to every gallon of milk to add two gallons of water; but that since the Act came into operation, the water had disappeared, and the milk was sound. That, he thought, ought to be sufficient reason for continuing the operation of the Act in Ireland. The particular fault mentioned was, that there were only two or three analysts appointed for several towns, and that consequently there was a difficulty in meeting the public requirements. He could not remember the evidence that was given as to Scotland, but he believed the evidence was that in Edinburgh, at all events, the milk never had been adulterated. As to the word "knowingly," if it were retained in the Bill all attempts to check adulteration would be hopeless. He also objected to the use of the words "according to the usage of trade," on the ground that trade usages were often anything but what they ought to be. There was in the Bill another clause, which provided that if a defendant proved he had sold the article in the same state in which he had purchased it, and with a warranty in writing to that effect, he should be discharged. It was obvious, however, that, even if there were a warranty, it would afford no evidence that the article had not been wilfully adulterated, because the warranty might have been given by a man of straw. The recommendations of the Committee were, that if a warranty in writing were produced by a defendant, the case should be adjourned, and that the justices should direct a summons to be issued against the person or persons from whom the defendant had purchased the articles, who, if found guilty of adulteration, should be liable to the penalties imposed. For his own part, he could see no objection to the insertion of a clause embodying those recommendations of the Committee. Certainly, the wholesale dealer ought to be held responsible, if it were clearly proved that the retailer purchased the articles of him in an adulterated state. If that alteration were made in the Bill it would be a most valuable one. In Birmingham and the neighbourhood there was a large number of respectable grocers, who did not object to a Bill against adulteration, though they were averse from being annoyed by analysts who did not understand their work. Then, further, if tea were to be inspected in bond, why should not wine be inspected also? More persons were poisoned by wine than by tea, and what the Committee heard about Hamburg sherry was enough to make people turn teetotalers next morning. It would, in his opinion, be dangerous for the Government to undertake the examination of tea in bond, and both his hon. Friend the Member for Maldon (Mr. Sandford) and himself opposed Government inspection in the Committee, but they were beaten by a majority of 1 or 2. If the principle were once admitted it would open the way to the introduction of a whole army of Inspectors for the examination of other articles in bond besides tea. He was thoroughly opposed to the systematic robbery of the poor, and, although the present Bill was far from perfect, it might, if amended in the way he had indicated, prove a very useful measure.

MR. PELL said, the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Muntz) had misunderstood the 2nd clause, which, in fact, extended the operation of the Bill to Ireland and Scotland. He mentioned that in order to show the difficulty under which hon. Members laboured in consequence of the short time given to them for the consideration of measures. Under the Bill no fewer than 280 separate authorities would have the power, if they chose to exercise it, of appointing a petty officer to undertake very important duties. That number of authorities was far too large, and he should like to see some limit of population placed to the authorities who might appoint analysts. If, however, they prevented a small borough from appointing an analyst, the inhabitants who desired to have an article analyzed could go to the adjoining area to have it done for them. But then came the obvious inference that they would get the services of an officer who was paid by one local authority doing the work of another without their contributing to remuneration. That arose very much from Clause 12, which limited the charge for the performance of a very intricate duty, and one which required a man of high standing and education, to the inadequate amount of 10s. 6d. A number of analyses would be worth nothing, if performed for such an inadequate sum. The analyst's remuneration certainly was to be made up by salary, so that when he was appointed he would know the maximum he could get for his services; but the salary was to come from one portion of the community — namely, those unhappy people who, up the present moment, had contributed exclusively to many charges which ought to be borne by the community generally. He should propose an Amendment to remove this maximum amount to be paid for an analysis, for he thought it only fair, since the Government retained a voice in the appointment of the analyst, that his salary should be partly paid by contributions from the Imperial Exchequer and the local authorities. He hoped that the Amendments to be submitted in Committee would receive favourable consideration from the Government, and that the Bill would be improved in many of its provisions before it was allowed to pass into law. His fear was, that there was a danger of no public analyst being appointed at all, seeing that the option of such an appointment was to rest with the 280 local authorities to whom the Bill would apply. Such a result would be a misfortune, more especially where the public mind was strongly in favour of the appointment of an analyst. He trusted the danger would be avoided, and that where the Government exercised any supervision they should be prepared to contribute annually towards the cost of such officials.

MR. WHITWELL said, he was glad to hear of the proposal to stop the import of bad tea, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill would give the House some idea of what the conditions were under which it was proposed to allow questionable tea to go into use. It might be difficult to deal with all articles upon importation, for in many cases articles of consumption were adulterated afterwards. Clause 8 seemed to enact that, if the ingredients introduced for the purpose of adulteration were not hurtful, the articles sold might be described as "mixed." Surely, however, that was not sufficient, for in his opinion, the ingredients mixed with the original article ought to be stated; because it would be more satisfactory to persons purchasing, to know what the article was mixed with, than merely to know it was mixed. He thought, also, that the Bill should not be limited to articles of food and to drugs. Why should it not include snuff and tobacco? The Report of the Inland Commissioners showed a very extensive adulteration in the latter article. Out of 71 samples offered to the Excise, not less than 51 were adulterated; while sugar was adulterated with sand and other inorganic matter sometimes to the extent of 50 per cent. Another matter stated in the same Report was, that methylated liquors were greatly reduced in strength, and that, in his opinion, was a matter deserving consideration.

SIR HENRY PEEK said, that speaking with a practical knowledge of the tea trade of over 30 years, and having read the Bill with great care and attention, he had no hesitation in giving it his support. The question of the examination of tea in bond had the entire approval of the trade; and he believed that not one ounce in every ton which came to England was adulterated here. The examination of tea in bond, while still under Government control, was a very easy matter; not more than 5 parcels in 1,000 would require any examination at all; and if those 5 were found to contain anything injurious to health, it would not be difficult to prevent their going into consumption. Referring to the term "adulteration"—and, in passing, he would say that it was an unheard of thing to make penal an offence which, for six months past, the authorities had been endeavouring in vain to define—some of the analysts went as far as to say that all green tea was adulterated with deleterious matter, and a gentleman who was High Sheriff of Anglessea had been fined a large sum for retailing the very finest green tea procurable. The fact was, that analysts wished to make themselves out exceedingly clever, and, as a means of blowing their own trumpets, made the most of the very least quantities of foreign matters they discovered in the various samples submitted to them. With regard to the term "custom of trade," it was very difficult to say what should or what should not be allowed; but it was a monstrous thing that the Government should be permitted to prepare their cocoa and mustard in a manner that would subject a private dealer to punishment for selling an adulterated article. His own opinion was that where, in the words of the Report, people were cheated, and not poisoned, it was better to leave them to seek their own remedies. When the proper time arrived he should be able, on the part of the trade, to show how the Bill might be considerably improved.

MR. CARPENTER - GARNIER, in supporting the Bill, said, that having sat upon the Select Committee appointed to consider this subject last year, he wished to express his opinion that the Bill would remedy all the grievances of traders, while it gave increased protection to the public. He thought that the exception in Clause 6, relating to the usage of trade, should be omitted, dealers in mixed articles being sufficiently protected by Clause 8, which provided that there should be a written or a printed label on the article to be sold as a mixture, now cocoa and mustard came under this proviso, the first being generally mixed with farina and sugar, and the second with wheat flour coloured with turmeric; and, in his opinion, if such mixtures were no more than were ordinarily required, and if they did not materially add to the weight or bulk, the article should be exempt from penalty. He agreed with the hon. Member for Maldon (Mr. Sandford) that it was a pity they did not get at the wholesale dealer, and that the retail trader should not be allowed to show that the article complained of was in the same state in which he had received it from the wholesale trader, and so throw the liability on the latter; because, although the retail dealer had at present the Common Law right of proceeding against the wholesale trader, the cost of taking proceedings was so great as practically to debar him from the exercise of that right. As to the Act of 1872, it was practically a dead letter in the country districts, because the Inspectors who were generally superintendents of police, could not be spared from their other duties to take the samples to the analyst for examination, he was therefore glad to see that by the Bill, the sample might be sent by post.

MR. ALDERMAN COTTON observed that in due time he should move a new Proviso to Clause 30, to the effect that before tea was forfeited or destroyed the owner or owners might call in three sworn tea-brokers, and in the event of a majority of them being of the analyst's opinion then the tea should be absolutely destroyed; but in the event of the tea being pronounced by a majority to be marketable, it should be delivered to the owner. The cost of such certificate to be not less than £3 3s., or more than £15 15s.

MR. CLARE READ said, a complaint had been made that people might mix poisonous articles with food under the Bill. Clause 4, however, provided that persons selling food containing anything injurious to health would be dealt with very seriously; for the offender would be liable to a penalty of £50 for the first offence, and for a second offence, he might be imprisoned for a period not exceeding six months, and there were no exceptions whatever to the operation of the clause. Objection had also been made that a poor man would not receive what he asked for; but Clause 6 provided that whatever was asked for should be of "the nature, substance, and quality" he demanded. If it should be proved, as had been stated, that as much as 75 per cent of starch had been mixed with cocoa, no magistrate would hesitate to impose a penalty, for the demand would be for cocoa, and not for starch. He would admit that it had certainly been a recommendation of the Select Committee, that when the retail dealer proved to the satisfaction of a justice that he sold his articles in the same state as he received them from the wholesale dealer, the justice should be allowed to adjourn the inquiry and summon the wholesale dealer to attend; but however simple that appeared to be in theory, it was found very difficult in practice. It had been asked how it came to pass that tea was the only article that had been, so to say, taken under the protection of the Government on being imported. The reason was, that it was the only article which had been represented as coming into this country in a seriously adulterated state. The hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Muntz) said that there was some sort of doctoring of tea in England. That might be, but the conclusion to which the evidence taken by the Committee had brought him was, that there was very little adulteration of it practised in this country. He had only heard of two insignificant cases in which dealers had adulterated or coloured tea. It was very different with wine, which after its import was mixed and fortified by the trade. There had been expressions of opinion that several counties and boroughs should unite in the appointment of an analyst. The Bill made that desirable object easy, and it enabled samples to be sent by post, so there was no reason why ten or a dozen counties should not be under the superintendence of an analyst residing in London. As regarded the smallness of a neighbouring analyst's fee, referred to by the hon. Member for Leicestershire (Mr. Pell), there was a great deal of force in the hon. Member's observations, and he had no doubt his right hon. Friend (Mr. Selater-Booth) would meet that objection. Tobacco, he believed, was very little adulterated, and even if it were it was sharply looked after by the Excise. With regard to the observation that the operations of the Bill were confined to England, all he could say was that the Government intended and were desirous to extend it to Ireland and Scotland, and if, upon consideration with the legal advisers of the Department, it was found that this wish could be carried out, the alterations would be made in Committee. In reference to the suggestion that adulteration should be defined, he would express his opinion that any attempt to define it would completely fail, for instance, he had got about 40 definitions of it, and a more terrible jumble and confusion of the different ideas of adulteration he never saw; and as he believed the principle of the Bill was a good one, he hoped that with some few Amendments in Committee it would pass into law.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR said, that in the preparation of the Bill the Government had to keep two objects in view—first, the removal of certain hardships of which traders might fairly complain; second, their removal in such a way as would not prove injurious to the public. The operations of the Acts of 1860, 1867, and 1872 had been very beneficial. Prior to the passing of the last Act, the usage of the trade was to place 25 per cent of water in milk. That usage was condemned, and now milk could be had without any prejudicial amount of adulteration. Again, the usage with regard to bread was to place alum in flour, and to sell bread to the poor of a very inferior quality, made of the adulterated flour: for the object of using alum was to employ flour of deteriorated quality. The Acts had condemned that injurious practice. Their operation also drove what was known in the trade as "Canton capers," or tea which was imported in an adulterated condition, to other markets, and they required that coffee and mustard, which before had each been much mixed, should, when mixed, be labelled, so that the purchaser might at all events know what he was buying. Vinegar, too, which before the passing of the Act was adulterated with sulphuric acid, was now to be had in a pure condition. Thus, the articles of food in greatest consumption had been materially improved, and what he wished the House to consider was, whether the present Bill would relieve traders of what they considered hardships at the expense of the public. In his opinion it would, unless considerable amendments of its provisions were made in Committee. He would point out some of its clauses which induced him to think that much more serious protection of the public was required than the Bill afforded. In the existing Acts it was assumed that the seller of an article knew his business sufficiently well to know whether it was pure or impure. The Preamble of the Act of 1867 required that persons selling articles of food should have a sufficient practical knowledge of their business; and the 24th section enacted that the adulteration was to be assumed, unless the contrary was proved by the seller, who was to be deemed to have had knowledge of such adulteration, and the existence and propriety of that responsibility had been affirmed by several judgments of the Superior Courts. But the Bill said in effect that ignorance instead of knowledge was to be assumed. The question of "knowingly" came in. A person was to be punished who "knowingly" sold an adulterated article, so that he could save himself by not knowing his business at all. For his part, he feared that this word "knowingly" would neutralize the benefit intended to be secured by the Bill, and then again the Bill recognized the "usage of trade." But it had been a usage of trade to add 25 per cent of water to milk, to mix alum with flour, to "strengthen" vinegar by adulteration, and so on, and all those usages of trade would, he feared, spring up again under the Bill. Another clause deserved attention. By the 25th clause the defendant was relieved, if he sold the article as it was bought by him under a warranty. Of course, in future there would be a warranty on every invoice, and the responsibility of the retailer would practically cease. But the Bill made no attempt to punish the actual adulterator who sold the impure article to the retailer. The Select Committee recommended that, and without a provision to that effect the Act would be useless. The hon. Member for Leicestershire (Mr. Pell) had, he thought, hit a blot in the Bill. It was impossible to get a chemical analysis such as would be required under this Bill for 10s. 6d., and therefore it would be more correct to say that the consumer would have the right to go and get an analysis at the expense of the ratepayers. It would be necessary to have combined areas with efficient public analysts at salaries of from £100 to £200 a-year, and it would be more accurate to say that the cost of the analysis would be 10s. 6d., plus the salary drawn from the ratepayers and paid to the analyst. His hon. Friend had stated that it was intended that Scotland and Ireland should be introduced; but the Bill expressly said that nothing in the Act should apply to Scotland or Ireland, "except as hereinafter provided," and he found nothing provided in the Bill on the subject. At present Scotland and Ireland were left out in the cold; but he was sure that a provision would be made in the Bill to remedy any such inconvenience.

MR. SALT said, that one good point in the Bill was, that it repealed two Acts of Parliament and consolidated the law on the subject. That was the proper course to pursue, as Acts of this class went all over the country, and had to be construed by persons who were not familiar with legal phraseology. He

(Mr. Salt), who said the poor man was not considered in the Bill. That was not really so; but under the provisions of the Bill the police and public officer would be in duty bound to take care of such cases. He admitted that the term "knowingly" was used too frequently in the 6th and 9th clause, and he would consider whether it should not, in some instances at least, be struck out. He was not surprised also that many hon. Members had taken exception to the words in Clause 6, which referred to the usages of trade, and he would carefully consider whether the object of the Bill was not sufficiently provided for, as he believed it was, by the subsequent part of the clause. With reference to the complaint of the hon. Member for Leicestershire (Mr. Pell), that in addition to the charge of 10s. 6d. for analysis, a supplementary charge was raised out of the rates, he could not help thinking if any charge on the rates was reasonable this was a charge of that kind. In conclusion, he would say that it was not intended by the Bill to take away from Scotland and Ireland the advantages they had hitherto enjoyed. He thanked hon. Members for the various suggestions which had been made, and he could assure the House they would all be considered by him with every anxiety to make the Bill as perfect as possible.

Mr. LYON PLAYFAIR asked when the Bill would be taken into Committee?

Mr. SCLATER-BOTH said, that it would be put down for Thursday week.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday 4th March.

House adjourned at half after Ten o'clock till Monday next.

Mr. Solater-Booth

RAILWAYS—RAILWAY PASSENGER ACCOMMODATION.—OBSERVATIONS.

LORD REDESDALE rose to call their Lordships' attention to the state of the law in regard to the liability of Railway Companies to provide proper accommodation for different classes of passengers. He believed very few of the travelling public were aware of what they could demand of the Railway Companies, or what the Companies were bound to afford them. Railways were now practically the only means of travelling through the greater part of the country; yet the public were not aware that they were literally at the mercy of the Railway Companies. The terms "first class," "second class," and "third class" were in such general use that people supposed an obligation on the part of the Companies to have carriages of different classes; but it was for the Railway Companies to say whether there were to be any distinctions of class at all on their lines. Again, Railway Companies were not bound to carry any particular species of goods. The occasion of his calling attention to these matters was the movement made by the Midland Company in determining no longer to carry second-class passengers. That Company might go further if it chose, and say it would carry no first-class passengers—there was no law to prevent the Company from carrying such an intention into effect. Unquestionably, when railways were first established, it was the intention of Parliament that three classes of passengers should be carried, and he was convinced that the necessities of the travelling classes required that extent of accommodation. What the intention of Parliament was in the matter was shown by the fact that in the several Acts constituting Railway Companies, maximum fares for each of those classes were set out in plain terms, and until recently the general practice was to have first, second, and third-class carriages on every line of railway. That practice had now been departed from; but if a Railway Company had a right to say that they would not carry second-class passengers, they had also a right to say that they would not carry first-class passengers. The doctrine, in fact, laid down by the Midland Railway Company was this—that they were not bound to consider what the public were entitled to receive from them, but what was most profitable for their shareholders, and that it was therefore open to them to say that they would only carry third-class passengers. He admitted that, taking the Railway Companies as a whole, they had exercised their passenger-carrying power in a satisfactory manner; but he thought the time had come when it was absolutely necessary that some legislation should take place for the purpose of giving to the public adequate protection against them. There was no definition of the minimum amount of accommodation that was to be afforded to the several classes of passengers, and it was in the power of the Companies to provide no better than cattle trucks, and to say to passengers—"There is your carriage; go into it or not, as you choose." There were many other matters connected with the passenger traffic of railways which also required attention. He had mentioned one; he would mention another, also of great importance. At present there was no legal definition as to the minimum extent of accommodation which should be provided for passengers in any one of the three classes. There were great complaints with regard to the accommodation now supplied to passengers, and he might remark that there were frequent complaints, especially on the part of season-ticket holders, that owing to the want of sufficient accommodation in the class for which they paid, they were obliged to put up with seats in a carriage of an inferior class. He did not ask the Government for any reply on the present occasion, as his object was to throw out points for consideration and for future discussion; but he would suggest that Her Majesty's Government should at once call on the various Railway Companies for a Return of the accommodation in the carriages provided by them for the different classes of passengers, respectively, from 1870 to the present time. He wanted nothing unreasonable. For many years it was the practice to insert in Railway Bills passing through Parliament, a clause to the effect that nothing in the Act should exempt the Company from any general Act regarding railways, and it would not therefore be open to them to object to a general measure of the character which he suggested. The law on the matter was in such an unsatisfactory state that some legislation should take place in reference to it. His object in calling attention to the subject was not to call on the Government to say what they intended to do in the matter, but to ventilate the subject with a view to future legislation.

LORD CARLINGFORD said, that if it was found on inquiry desirable to extend the powers of the Railway Commissioners, who were discharging their duties in such a manner as to inspire the confidence of the public and the Railway Companies, he should not oppose such a measure; but he confessed he was unable to see on what grounds the noble Lord the Chairman of Committees invoked the aid of Parliament. The noble Lord had spoken of the step recently taken by the Midland Company; but he (Lord Carlingford) did not understand him to question its legality. [Lord REDESDALE assented.] It certainly appeared that the Company itself had taken that step with a full belief in its own legal powers. He found, in an interesting Report made to the Minister of Public Works in France, by a French gentleman (M. de Franqueville) sent over here by the French Government, that the gentleman in question had a conversation with Mr. Allport, the manager of the Midland Company, some time before that Company publicly announced its intention to abolish the use of second-class carriages on its line. When Mr. Allport informed the gentleman that it was intended to take that step, he said—"What, will Parliament allow you to abolish second-class carriages?" Mr. Allport replied—"We are not bound by law to carry passengers at all." The only thing Railway Companies were bound to do in this respect was to allow other parties to run rolling stock on their lines; but they were not bound to run it themselves. Certainly, some argument in favour of an implied obligation to run carriages of various classes might be drawn from those clauses in the various Railway Acts which referred to first, second, and third classes; but, until lately, there was virtually a fourth class of passenger carriage in this country, the Parliamentary train, though it became merged into the third. He did not regard the change made by the Midland Company in the same light as that in which it was viewed by the noble Lord. If that any had abolished second-class

ges, they had done so by giving assengers who had occupied those ges the advantage of travelling less in future. The only persons ad any ground of complaint were l first-class passengers. He could ink that the noble Lord had made y case for interference by Par-it, and he submitted that time
l be given for the practical work-

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—Resolution in Committee—Ordered—East India Home Government [Pensions].*

Ordered—First Reading—Building Societies Act (1874) Amendment [72].*

First Reading—Intoxicating Liquors (Ireland) [71].*

Second Reading—Regimental Exchanges [3]; Superannuation Act (1859) Amendment* [64]; Registry of Deeds Office (Ireland)* [70].*

Considered as amended—Common Law Procedure Act (1852) Amendment [33].*

ELECTION.

Mr. SPEAKER informed the House, that he had received from one of the Judges selected, pursuant to the Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, for the Trial of Election Petitions, a Certificate and Report relating to the St. Ives Election; and the same was read.

POST OFFICE—RECEIVING HOUSES—
QUESTION.

Mr. WALTER JAMES asked the Postmaster General, Whether there is a regulation precluding public-houses and beer-shops from being used as district post offices and receiving houses; and, if so, whether the same arrangement ought not to be extended to grocers and others having licences for the sale of intoxicating liquors?

LORD JOHN MANNERS, in reply, said, there was such a regulation in existence as that mentioned by the hon. Gentleman, but he saw no necessity for its extension to such persons as those referred to in the latter part of the Question.

CUSTOMS DUTIES (IRELAND)—BANK
NOTES.—QUESTION.

Mr. O'SULLIVAN asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If it is a fact that the Collectors of Her Majesty's Customs at Limerick and other Custom Houses in Ireland refuse to take payment of Customs Duty unless such payments were made in gold or Bank of Ireland notes; and, if so, if he will explain to the House the reasons why the Custom House Officers are ordered to refuse the notes of the National Bank, the Provincial Bank, and the Northern Banks of issue?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, that no order whatever had been given to the collectors of Customs to refuse any bank-notes. The question whether they would take any other than legal tender, which included Bank of England and Ireland notes as well as gold, was one entirely for themselves to decide, as they were responsible for paying over the money which they received.

MAILS TO MONTSERRAT.—QUESTION.

Mr. DIXON asked the Postmaster General, Whether, referring to the Correspondence recently laid before Parliament concerning the present inconvenient and defective Postal service to the Island of Montserrat, and in view of the fact that as a consequence the mails due from that island by the steamship "Nile," which arrived on the 14th instant, have not arrived, there be anything in the working of the new Contract with the Royal Mail Company which need prevent the Mails being exchanged at Montserrat, as was formerly done by the ships of that Company?

LORD JOHN MANNERS, in reply, said, the company were not bound by the terms of their contract to call at Montserrat; but having been asked on more than one occasion if they were willing to do so, they answered that they were ready, provided it was found not to interfere with their other arrangements, to take the practicability of giving the increased postal facilities indicated by the Question, into their favourable consideration.

POST OFFICE—SORTERS AND SAVINGS BANK CLERKS.—QUESTIONS.

Mr. GOLDSMID asked the Postmaster General, If he would explain to the House on what grounds he inflicted the severe punishments of dismissal and stoppage of promotion on the sorters of the Post Office for memorializing for an increase of pay, and on the clerks in the Savings Bank for alleged communications with the public press?

LORD JOHN MANNERS: In answering the Question of the hon. Gentleman, Sir, it will be necessary for me to separate the case of the sorters from that of the clerks in the Savings Bank. Of the sorters, five were dismissed, and several young men who had very recently been promoted were reduced to their former position on the understanding that if they behaved well they would after a short period be restored. The five men were dismissed not for memorializing for an increase of pay, but because they had allied themselves to professional agitators outside the Department, by whose assistance they were promoting agitation within. I may remind the House that the case of the minor establishment in London, including the sorters, was considered in July, and their pay and prospects were then improved. In the case of the clerks of the Savings Bank, none were dismissed, but promotion was stopped because statements had appeared in the public Press not only reprehensible in themselves, as imputing corrupt motives to the Controller of the department, but obviously proceeding upon information which could not have been derived except from official sources. A similar offence had been committed earlier in the same year, when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Edinburgh (Mr. Lyon Playfair) was at the head of the Post Office, and had been treated in a similar way. Among those statements, I may observe, were some challenging the propriety of the very promotions which I have felt it my duty to suspend. A Committee, consisting of gentlemen not belonging to the Savings Bank, has been appointed to inquire into this and other matters connected with that department, and I am now awaiting their Report, which, I have reason to believe, will be presented to me in a few days.

MR. GOLDSMID inquired if the stoppage of promotion still continued?

LORD JOHN MANNERS replied that it was necessarily so until he received the Report of the Committee.

QUESTION.

MR. WAIT asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether it is true that Lady Franklin had requested that the last representative and nephew of the late Sir John Franklin might be appointed to one of the sub-lieutenancies in connection with the Arctic expedition; and, whether such request has been refused?

Lord John Manners

MR. HUNT: Sub-Lieutenant Franklin was one out of 44 officers of that rank who applied for employment in the Arctic expedition, and Lady Franklin wrote to urge that he might be selected. It was decided that only two sub-lieutenants should be appointed—one for each ship. Great pains were taken to select the fittest of those who had offered themselves, and for a service of so peculiar a character it was impossible to let sentiment prevail over other considerations. Had the number of sub-lieutenants to be employed been larger, young Mr. Franklin would have been chosen. I can assure my hon. Friend I feel much sympathy with Lady Franklin in the disappointment she feels with regard to this matter.

SANITARY ACTS—IMPURE WATER (METROPOLIS).—QUESTION.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether his attention has been called to the following statement made by Dr. Sandwith in "The Times" of the 11th instant:—

"At a large West-end Club the drinking water supplied by a certain Water Company left such abundant deposits of mud in the cisterns that it was necessary frequently to clean them. I saw large cakes of this dried mud, which had a peculiarly offensive appearance; a portion of it was sent to an eminent analyst, and he found it to consist of various unwholesome débris and of a considerable quantity of human excrement;"

and, whether he is in a position to make any statement calculated to diminish the alarm which such an allegation must excite?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH: The letter, Sir, which appeared in The Times on the 11th of February did attract my attention, and I have been since that date in frequent communication with the Metropolis Water Examiner on the subject. He has been investigating the structural arrangements of the club in question—"Name!"—it is a Pall Mall Club—and I hope in a day or two to receive his Report. With regard to the second part of the Question, considering how the matter is neglected, I am unable to make any statement which will be reassuring to the public as to what the condition of the tanks, cisterns, and pipes within their own control may be; but I may state that the water supplied by the company referred to has been

during the past month in a wholesome state, as appears by the analysis recently published. The water of the company is peculiarly liable to pollution in time of flood, and great complaints were made of it in the early part of December. I then caused an official inquiry and analysis to be made, under the statutory powers of the Local Government Board, and the company have in consequence introduced a Bill which will enable them greatly to improve their intake, and to provide large additional subsiding tanks. This they would have been glad to do two years ago, but the Bill then introduced for the purpose was thrown out on the second reading.

POLICE AND LUNACY GRANTS (SCOTLAND).—QUESTION.

MR. RAMSAY asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he is prepared to state now the date from which the Grants for Police and Lunacy in Scotland will become payable; and, whether the distribution of the sum to be voted in aid of the maintenance of pauper lunatics in Scotland would be applicable to all such patients who are subject to and under the General Board of Lunacy?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The Scotch Police Grant will be paid from the 16th of March, 1874. The provision in next year's Estimate will be for one year only—namely, that ended on the 15th of March, 1875. The Government contribution will be paid annually, because the police accounts are made up for the year, and not for the half-year, as in England. The contribution for the year to the 15th of March, 1876, will not become due until after the 31st of March, 1876, because the annual accounts will not have been audited before that date. Therefore only one year's contribution is provided for in next year's Estimate. With regard to pauper lunatics in Scotland, the date at which the Government contribution will begin will be the 14th of May, 1874. Nothing will be contributed in respect of the broken period from the 1st of April to the 14th of May, 1874, because the rate had been struck for that period long before the Government grant was announced. It is intended to make the Lunacy Grant applicable to all patients who are subject to and under the inspection of the General Board of Lunacy, with two qualifications—(1), that the lunatic shall have been sent to an asylum or lunatic ward of a workhouse, &c., under order of the Lunacy Board, and (2) that the lunatic is charged upon the parochial rates.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS—EMIGRANT VESSELS.—QUESTION.

MR. HAYTER asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether, in view of the great loss of life attendant upon the burning of the "Cospatrick," he will undertake to insist upon a system of fire-drill, similar to that practised on board Her Majesty's men-of-war, being adopted on board of all emigrant ships; that the crew be practised in lowering the boats, and that a proper supply of provisions, with oars and rudders, be kept at all times in each of the boats?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: Among the suggestions, Sir, issued by the Board of Trade to the captains of emigrant ships, there is one that a crew of picked men should be assigned to each boat, under the charge of an officer, a steady person, who is responsible for every thing being kept at hand and ready for use, and that the men should be exercised in lowering the boats at sea when opportunities occur. It is also suggested that the fire engines which by law must be carried should be likewise under special charge, and worked once or twice a-week, so as to be kept in proper order. Every equipment—oars, rudder, sails, hatchets, &c.—must be in every boat before it is passed by the Board of Trade surveyor. As to provisioning boats, which the best lines do, a further suggestion is now being made by the Board of Trade. With regard to the suggestions as to drill, no law enables the Board of Trade to enforce them; nor, if there were a law, would it probably be possible practically to enforce it.

REPORT OF LABOUR LAWS COMMISSION.—QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES LEGARD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been called to the fact that the Report of the Labour Laws Commission appeared in the "Scotsman" newspaper of Thursday the 18th of February, when such Report had not been presented to this House;

and, whether he can give any explanation of the circumstance?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS; I believe, Sir, it is true that a Report, purporting to be the Report of the Labour Laws Commissioners, did appear in The Scotsman newspaper on the morning of Thursday last. The Report of the Labour Laws Commission, however, was only delivered at the Home Office on Wednesday. It varies in certain material points from that which appeared in The Scotsman, and therefore the document cannot by any possibility have been got from the Home Office. The hon. Gentleman asks me, in the latter part of his Question, if I can explain the circumstances under which it was obtained. I only wish I could. I have communicated with the secretary of the Labour Laws Commission, and he tells me he is quite unable to give me any information about it.

QUESTION.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether he will give to the House the outline of the scheme referred to by him in moving for leave to introduce the Merchant Shipping Bill, and by which he proposes to give assistance to the training of boys for the Merchant Service?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: The outline of the scheme referred to, to give assistance for the training of boys for the Merchant Service is to offer grants of £30, or £15 per annum for two years' training, out of the Mercantile Marine Fund—a large portion of which comes from fees taken at Mercantile Marine offices—to the managers of training ship schools for boys not less than 16 years old, who have not been committed by magistrates, and who have been apprenticed to the master of the school, and trained at least two years. Part of that time they must have worked in a sailing tender, or coasting vessel. They must also satisfy the Board of Trade as to conduct, physical fitness, and knowledge of a seaman's duties. The grant will be given on the apprenticeship being transferred to the master of a merchant ship. The Admiralty make a further proposal for such boys, relating to the Naval Reserve, which the First Lord will explain in moving the Navy Estimates. The two together, added to the voluntary contributions, will probably effect the object in view—that of supplying a large number of well-trained seamen to the merchant service.

(Mr. Secretary Hardy, Mr. Stanley.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said: Mr. Speaker, the Bill which I have now to present to the House is the same measure I laid before it at the close of last Session, and really, when I first brought it before their notice, I was quite unaware of the amount of opposition it was likely to receive, and I must confess I cannot at the present moment understand upon what grounds the formidable opposition now offered to it is based. In deference to the opinions expressed I have put off the second reading till now, and I hope hon. Gentlemen opposite are satisfied with the time that has been allowed them. I propose to say nothing which does not strictly refer to the Bill, but for the better understanding of our proposals, it will be necessary that I should give a short history of the law which has been in force with respect to Regimental Exchanges up to the present time. Before the abolition of what was known as the Purchase System in the Army, payments for regimental exchanges were illegal, unless fixed by regulation. Under the statute of Edward VI. any purchase of office was illegal, but that Act was not held to apply to military commissions. By the Act 49 Geo. III. c. 126, s. 6, military commissions were included, as, indeed, were all offices throughout the country. There was a provision, however, upon which "purchase" was founded, and which was to the effect that any officer taking a larger sum, directly or indirectly, for his commission than that allowed by the Army regulation, on conviction by court-martial, forfeited his commission, and was ordered to be cashiered. The rule in practice, however, was frequently broken. But with respect to exchanges no regulation was laid down, and they went on precisely in the same way as they had done before the Act 49 Geo. III, c. 126, was passed—that is to say, they were treated as military questions to be settled by the military authorities, and, provided the efficiency of the service did not suffer, exchanges were allowed. Being simply matters of personal convenience, and it being found that they did no harm to the service, any monetary transactions which passed with respect to these exchanges were officially unknown at the Horse Guards, as they were afterwards unknown at the War Office, until the present law came into force. Now, I may observe that exchanges stand on a totally different footing from purchase. In the case of purchase, a new office or commission is obtained; but in exchanges, the person who does the transaction only gets an office similar to that which he already holds, and, indeed, he rather loses by it, for the rule is that the exchanger goes to the lowest position among officers of his rank in the regiment to which he transfers himself. The officer who exchanges, therefore, cannot be said to purchase either emolument or commission. Now, Sir, it has been asked by many—"Why has the Bill been introduced? Why have you not proceeded by Warrant?" I admit I might have proceeded by Warrant, but I am of opinion such a method is objectionable in itself, and that Parliament ought to have the opportunity of deciding upon the alteration in the law which I am about to propose. There is another reason for not proceeding by Warrant. Had I done so, it would have been necessary for me, under the Act 49 Geo. III, c. 126, to lay down regulation prices, and I hope to show the House how very undesirable it is that regulation prices should be laid down for exchanges. To that I am decidedly opposed, for it was upon that principle, as applied to commissions, that the system of over-regulation prices was built which the country is now having to pay for. Sir, the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Hayter) was wrong when he said, on the introduction of the Bill, that it introduced for the first time the system of exchanges; as a matter of fact, they have never ceased to exist. Exchanges have continued in the Army from the very beginning, and more especially so since the British Army has been sent to so many different parts of the world; because it is necessary for an officer who wishes to serve his country that he shall be able to exchange from one climate to another more suitable to his health. It is generally supposed that officers exchange merely to get rid of disagreeable quarters, but there are many other grounds on which exchanges are effected. I heard the other day of an officer afflicted with asthma, who was ordered to Canada. He was told that it was a most dangerous climate for him, and he effected an exchange, not into a regiment in England, but into a regiment in India, which was an advantageous climate for him. These exchanges, therefore, do not always take place merely for luxury. A great many of them take place on other grounds which are important for the service and the interests of the public. It will be observed that this is a Bill which will only affect regimental exchanges. I do not propose to introduce exchanges from half-pay into regiments, for I conceive that if I did this I should be infringing upon purchase, by enabling a man who had practically no commission to purchase one. In former days, when officers were at the head of their regiments, there was sometimes an advantage in their having the facility of exchanging, as a means of bringing pressure to bear upon officers below them in rank. For instance, a lieutenant-colonel wishing to realize a large sum by the sale of his commission, and finding his regiment, unwilling to pay the amount, might say to his brother officers that unless they accepted his terms he would exchange into another regiment, and then, perhaps, a colonel would take his place who would not leave the regiment, and so promotion would be impeded. In this way the system of exchanging might in past times have been used as a means of bringing pressure to bear in order to secure a certain price for a commission. That power, however, has entirely gone. Under present circumstances, the value of each class of commission was fixed in November, 1871, and whatever may have happened since that date, no officer can obtain for his commission a larger sum than was so fixed. In all cases of exchanges made under the system formerly existing, very careful inquiry was made into all the circumstances in order to prevent officers of short standing being brought into regiments and passed over the heads of subalterns of long service, who were themselves consulted in

In all cases of exchanges made under the system formerly existing, very careful inquiry was made into all the circumstances in order to prevent officers of short standing being brought into regiments and passed over the heads of subalterns of long service, who were themselves consulted in ing a very foolish thing in declaring that exchanges are in favour of poor officers; but I am decidedly of opinion, that the system is far more in favour of poor officers than of rich ones. No doubt, gentlemen who are able—on account of private interest, illness, or family or other circumstances—may exchange in order to remain at home; but officers may be desirous of changing for many other reasons. There are also other reasons which seem to me to be strongly in favour of sanctioning these regimental exchanges. A man may have been posted to a regiment he does not like; he may wish to serve in a regiment in which his father served before him; he may have friends among the officers in one regiment and not in another, or he may be possessed with a very laudable desire to join a regiment in which his nationality is represented—a desire on his part which may fairly be encouraged. A Scotchman appointed to an English regiment may desire to exchange into a Scotch regiment, and a Welshman may wish to go into that distinguished regiment the 23rd Welsh Fusiliers. All these things ought to be carefully weighed and considered when the Bill is dealt with, and I want to know why we should put an unnecessary check upon these exchanges, when by abstaining from so doing we do no harm to the public interest, and at the same time do advantage to the service by securing, among other things, a feeling of contentment among the officers. Is it not highly desirable that we should have contented officers?—and it should be borne in mind that these exchanges have often been the turning point in a man's career. I will, with the permission of the House, read a passage from a letter I have received from a general officer of most distinguished character. I may not mention the name of the officer, but I may say that he is wholly unknown to me, that he is a K.C.B., the recipient of a good-service pension, and, moreover, a General of very great distinction. This officer said that, entering the Army with a light heart and a light purse, he wished to get early service. He, therefore, exchanged with a comrade in the same branch of the service—the Artillery—and went to Gibraltar, receiving in consideration of the exchange a sum not much larger than

"After a time, I returned from Gibraltar and was quartered in Ireland, but finding my pay of 6s. 10d. a-day and a continuance of home service likely to involve me in difficulties, of which I was somewhat forcibly reminded by a heavier bill from my tailor than I could at the time manage to pay, I looked about for an exchange. A few days after, the post brought me a letter from a brother officer, offering me £150 if I would go to the West Indies in his place. I dropped the letter in my joy, vaulted over the table in my barrack-room, knocking over the inkstand in doing so, and for some 20 minutes or more I was perfectly beside myself. With the remains of my ink I accepted the offer at once. Our applications were sent in and allowed by the authorities. There was perfect happiness all round, and even my tailor went on his way rejoicing. Under existing regulations this exchange, if permitted at all, would have been inquisitorially looked into and most probably considerably cut down. My richer brother-officer would have been better off, and I should have been so much the worse. My tailor would probably have had only a moiety of his bill. As to the public or the service, I do not see how either would have been in the least affected. If I had not been allowed to exchange as I did, it is possible the tailor, or some other embarrassment, might have cut short my career."

Upon what possible principle is it that with regard to exchanges such as this, you should inflict a great amount of hardship without at the same time doing anything to promote the public interest. As the gallant officer from whom I have quoted showed, the exchange he was enabled to effect was the turning point in his career, and I am sure the House must sympathize with young and ambitious men who, circumstanced as he was, are unable, from want of means or other reasons, to push their way in the profession they have adopted, but who would be materially assisted in their upward path, if permitted to make exchanges such as are contemplated in the Bill I am now asking the House to pass. Surely, we do not pay them so highly, when they are living in so expensive a country as this, as to make us desirous of preventing them getting some small bonus when they wish to exchange into a regiment quartered it may be in another part of the world. I feel quite certain that the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) would admit, that if this could be done under such conditions as would check anything improper, the mere passage of money between the officers is no injury to the public. I cannot help regretting that this question was so lightly touched upon when we were abolishing Purchase. It was swallowed up by the enormous question of Purchase, and anyone who looks at the debates will see how small a space was occupied by the subject of exchanges. In fact, it was not dealt with by the Bill at all. It was dealt with by Regulations and Warrants made by the Secretary of State. Let me say at once, that if I thought that by this Bill I was bringing back the Purchase system, or that I was even moving towards it, I should think I was acting a dishonest part in pressing forward this Bill. I feel as confident as I do of my own existence, that by proper regulations it would be easy to provide that any evils that might arise should be put an end to, and I am quite certain that in former days, when this system existed, none of the evils which some hon. Members seem to anticipate were experienced. With respect to the language which has been applied to this Bill—"retrograde," "re-actionary," and so on—I will say that if you have to change anything which has been done, you must take a step backwards. [Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Forwards.] The hon. Member says "forward." Well, I am going forward; but I am first going back, to put an end to something which I think ought not to exist. This matter was not taken up by me. It was forced upon me by the Commission which was called into existence by my Predecessors, and which I do not hesitate to say was a quasi-judicial body. It contained Lord Justice James, Lord Penzance, and my right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty. I believe that both Lord Justice James and Lord Penzance were against Purchase; and it was, therefore, not in the sense of Purchase that they gave their opinion in favour of exchanges. I think it is only right in my own justification that we should look at their Report. This question of exchanges was brought before the Commission by witnesses, and argued by Sir Percy Herbert; but they stopped him because they were so convinced that they did not think it was necessary to hear anything more. They had before them the letter of Mr. Vivian, who in this matter represented the views of Lord Cardwell, and they came to an unhesitating and decided conclusion. They swept the question of exchanges out of ceived payment, who felt the grievance of the alteration. As I understand it, this was the very thing which was put forward, and with which the Commission dealt by proposing to restore the former system, under which the great majority of the officers now in the Army entered the service. I quite understand the position which was taken by the hon. Member for Glasgow last year, who objected to exchanges altogether, that any money payment should pass on such occasions. [Mr. ANDERSON: No; I objected to a money traffic for gain.] It seems to me when a man is able to take out his wife, children, and servants at the expense of another person, that that is a payment which it is not necessary to make for his convenience, but is giving him all the luxuries of his position. What I propose is not a change in kind, but simply in degree—that you should relieve the Military Secretary from an obnoxious duty and separate him from every money transaction, you yourselves acting upon purely military grounds. The hon. Member for Bath said the other night—“How about selection?” Well, suppose a colonel has been selected for a particular regiment; he was selected by the Commander-in-Chief, and if he wished to exchange, he got that exchange by means of the Commander-in-Chief, and the authority which gave him the selection had power to control the exchange. The hon. Member also talked as if exchanges would be permitted between men who had served four years and others who had served one, and so a man would be able by exchanging to get three years' service; but that sort of thing will not be sanctioned for one moment by the authorities. A man is to exchange into the same condition of circumstances, not into totally different ones. Is that a thing which is forbidden elsewhere? No doubt, in some countries, where the service is principally at home, these questions do not so much arise, but what is the case in France? In France every military newspaper is full of advertisements for exchanges, and there is no objection on the part of the Government. On the contrary, I am assured that the military authorities in France give every encouragement to exchanges, on the principle that when men are satisfied with their position they will perform their duties with greater zeal and efficiency than they would do if they were not satisfied. The only things the French military authorities require in the case of a proposed exchange, are, first, the consent of the commanding officer, and secondly, that no expense shall fall upon the State. Well, I propose that no expense shall fall on the State. There has been no expense to the State hitherto, and nobody has proposed that there ever should be. It is said that a poor man may find himself in positions where he could not exchange. That is very true, and I do not propose to find in my Bill a panacea for poverty; but I will venture to say that rich and poor officers in the Army are alike anxious that this, which was open to them in former days, shall be restored, and restored on legal grounds, not leaving it to be connived at. There was something thrown out last year by the hon. Member for Stirling with respect to exchanges within regiments into different battalions. He knows as well as I do that those exchanges were not effected without money payments in former times. A letter was published the other day from a Gentleman who sat in this House during the late Parliament—Major Arbuthnot—who pointed out what advantage he had derived from an exchange with a brother officer to go to Rangoon. This is a position in which the military authorities would be upon their trial. The responsibility must always rest upon them; the means to be adopted for checking abuses in such cases must be left for their consideration, and they must be justified in each of these exchanges. Besides the authority of the Commissioners, I might refer to the evidence of officers who were examined before them, but I will not do so, because there were hardly any officers who were not in favour of exchanges. I will take, instead, the evidence of a gentleman who is no friend to Purchase, and who is himself one of the Purchase Commissioners, as they are called. What did Mr. O'Dowd say? He was asked this question—

“Supposing that the power of exchange was restored, do you think that it would be liable to be abused under the present non-purchase system?—So far as the public are concerned, no; and so far as individuals are concerned I would say no, with sharpness on the part of the authorities. You mean with ordinary vigilance on the part of the authorities?—Yes.”

Such was the opinion of Mr. O'Dowd, who, though an enemy to Purchase, drew a distinction between Purchase and Exchanges. Declarations have to be made at present, and it has been said that declarations are not always relied upon; but I agree with those who hold that if an officer does make a declaration, it ought to be strictly enforced by severe penalties, for I can conceive nothing worse than that declarations should, so to speak, fall into abeyance, and that officers should regard as mere formalities statements made upon their honour as gentlemen. In dealing with a question which has been solved by my predecessors in a way which, I think, has worked unsatisfactorily—which has been solved, not by the abolition, but by the regulation, of payment—I am surprised to find myself met, not by one Motion for the rejection of the Bill, but by three. The hon. Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan), the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Hayter), and the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) are all about to move that my Bill be read a second time this day six months. Recently we have heard a good deal about the union of parties, and I suppose this is an emblematic union of the old Whigs, the advanced Radicals, and even of the further-advanced Radicals who sit behind them. England, the Border Burghs, and Scotland have united, but I am glad to say Ireland is no party to this union against the Bill. To adopt Mrs. Malaprop's personification of their opposition, which is of three gentlemen at once—

"Cerberus hæc ingens latratu regna trifauci Personat."

In the course of this debate there will doubtless be loud expressions of wrath and indignation from these three opponents, and I have no honeyed words or soporific draughts to lull the suspicions of hon. Gentlemen opposite; but coming forward not in my own name only, I hold before me as a shield the Report of the Commission which was appointed on the Motion of my Predecessor. Upon the Report of the Commissioners I rely. I think their reasons are good, and that their proposal may fairly be carried out. I think it can be carried out to the content, and therefore to the advantage, of the Army; and I am sure it can be carried out without the slightest damage to the country. In conclusion, the right hon. Gentleman moved the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Secretary Hardy.)

MR. G. O. TREVELYAN, in rising to move that the Bill be read a second time this day six months, said: Mr. Speaker, we are asked to read for the second time a Bill which is very short, and which the Secretary at War, when he introduced it last year, speaking as he always speaks with perfect candour, described as relating to a very simple matter. It may be within the recollection of some part of the House that, on the introduction of this measure, I ventured to characterize it as complicated in its nature, retrograde in its bearings upon our recent legislation, and disastrous in its effects upon the tone and spirit, not only of our Army, but of the entire circle of our public services. Those words were not lightly spoken. There was not one of them which may not be made good by an appeal to the authority of men whose opinion is regarded as decisive by our Army, by the House of Commons, by the country at large, and by the right hon. Gentleman himself; and if such can be shown to be the case, it will be under a strong conviction of duty, and with some hope of success, that I shall appeal to hon. Members to reject the Bill. Now I will endeavour to state the arguments in favour of the Bill fairly, and answer them fully, and perhaps there is no better way of stating them than in the very words of the Commissioners who last year inquired into the grievances which officers alleged to have resulted from the abolition of Purchase; and in reading these words, I cannot but think that there is something about them which will have an unpleasant ring in the ears of hon. Gentlemen.

"There are many good officers of slender means who would be willing to serve in India or elsewhere for a consideration, and there are many good officers more blessed with the world's goods who for family or other reasons, or under medical advice, would be willing to give such a consideration."

Now, it is on these sentences that the Bill before us is based; it is on the recommendation of the Commissioners that the right hon. Gentleman has brought in his measure; but in so doing, the right hon. Gentleman has attributed to the Commission an authority which it does not possess, and which the distinguished Gentlemen who composed it would be the last to claim for it. That Commission was appointed to inquire into the pecuniary matters of officers, and into their pecuniary matters alone. It had no mission to go further and touch upon the result which the reversal of the policy or any part of the policy of Lord Cardwell would produce upon the discipline and the spirit of our Army. But that is not the situation of the right hon. Gentleman. He is responsible to Parliament for all that concerns that discipline and that spirit. He is bound to show that the measures which he introduces will be of advantage to the military future of the nation. He cannot shake off that responsibility by referring us to a Commission which was concerned with nothing but questions of pounds, shillings, and pence. Let him show us that this proposition will conduce to the efficiency of our Army. Let him prove to us that 20, 30, 50 years hence, our officers will be more skilful, more industrious, more experienced, and more ready to face hardships and privation in consequence of a system which, in the very words of the Commissioners on whose recommendation we recur to it, means nothing more or less than this—that poor men are to serve their country at Bermuda and Hong Kong, and that rich men are to serve their country in the Phoenix Park and in Pall Mall. Let him prove that, and if anyone has the ability required to prove it, it is he; but let him not put us off with the verdict of Commissioners who, in their capacity of Commissioners, have no more knowledge or authority on the subject than any three individual Members of this House. But, now, let us take the argument of this measure as stated by the Commissioners. There are, they tell us, many good officers who would be willing to serve in India and elsewhere for a consideration. Now, that is a state of things which undoubtedly exists, and will continue to exist as long as Her Majesty keeps her hold upon the Empire of India. There will always be a large number of officers who will not be willing to serve abroad without a consideration. Service in India is not in the long run so pleasant that a man will willingly stay there for nothing. But that consideration exists already, and has long existed, not in the questionable shape of a private douceur, handed over by one public servant to another, but in the legitimate, the honourable, the strictly defensible form of large extra emoluments, paid by the nation from the national treasury to the officers whom it employs, to compensate them for the extra risks of the climate and the extra discomforts of exile. A lieutenant-colonel in command of a regiment of cavalry at home receives less than £500 a-year; in India he receives upwards of £1,000. A major at home gets about £1 a-day; in India he gets 43s. or 44s. A captain's pay is nearly doubled; a lieutenant's pay is nearly doubled. All ranks of officers already obtain exactly that consideration which we are told, and justly told, is called for by the conditions of Indian service. The next argument in favour of this Bill is, that there are many good officers blessed with this world's goods who, for family reasons, and under medical advice, are anxious to give up foreign service, and join a regiment stationed at home. Now, in speaking of foreign service, with our Army distributed as it is at present, we are, in effect, speaking of India. Now, the circumstances of service in India are such that it is necessary that every facility should be given for the return of officers who have been there too long, or who should never have been there at all. Some men are constitutionally so framed that they cannot live in the Tropics, or can live there only as invalids. Others, who are healthy enough themselves, are married to wives who cannot support the climate; others, again, having growing families in course of education at home, find themselves face to face with the most painful of all domestic problems—whether the household in India is to be deprived of the wife, or the household in England to be deprived of the mother. If these considerations were overlooked by the Government, if a hard-and-fast line was drawn behind an officer who had once sailed for India, forbidding his return except at the sacrifice of his commission, our Army would have cause not only for grumbling, but for positive disaffection. But the system inaugurated by the late Secretary at War provides a remedy for this state of things. Lord Cardwell fully recognized that officers might be unable to stay in India for family reasons, and tration, under an absolute necessity of abolishing the Purchase system without the delay of a single session. A Royal Commission presided over by Sir George Grey, had, in the course of 1870, inquired into the custom of over-regulation prices. That Commission reported that the payment of those prices had been forbidden by statute, had been forbidden by regulation, had been at one time made illegal by a clause in the Mutiny Act, had been at another time made dishonourable by the solemn declaration on the part of the officer that he had not paid them; but that in spite of all these obstacles, legal and moral alike, the over-regulation prices continued freely to be paid, and commissions bore, and always had borne, not their official, but their market value. Their opinion was backed by that of responsible military authorities. The Duke of Cambridge, when questioned about the attitude of the Horse Guards with regard to the illegal practice, admitted that he was quite unable to stop it. This powerlessness on the part of our military chiefs proceeded from a cause which was well explained in the Report of the Commission, which says—

"In these transactions, when one man has something of value to sell which can legally be sold, and another man is desirous of purchasing it, the opportunity being afforded them of coming to a mutual understanding, it has been found useless to prescribe by law or regulation the precise terms on which the sale is to be effected."

Alter the word sale to barter and there you have the exact condition of things which will result under the Bill. The Report containing this remarkable sentence was signed, among others, by the First Lord of the Admiralty and by Lord Justice James—that is to say, by two out of three of those very Commissioners on whose authority we are now requested to expect that we may allow public servants once more to deal commercially in public functions, paying and receiving the difference in their marketable value, and at the same time keep out of our service the abuses of bonuses, over-regulation prices, and other concomitants of the abolished system, if only, say they, the authorities, will adopt proper precautions. Now, what reason have we to hope that those precautions will prove effective in preventing abuses in the sale of exchanges, which these very Commissioners allow to have proved ineffective in the sale of commissions? With all respect for the Commissioners, I prefer on this subject a military opinion. Lord West explained to the Purchase Commission how, as long as exchanges on the old system are permitted, the officers of a regiment where promotion is slow will make up a purse—and hon. and gallant Gentlemen who have served in the Army know, and hon. Gentlemen who have not served in the Army can easily guess, what sort of process the making of a purse in a regiment is—in order to induce a colonel or a major, or a captain high in the list, to exchange with an officer of like rank in another regiment, who is willing, as soon as a decent and plausible period has elapsed, to retire and give everyone a step upwards. Lord West, describing this process with a minuteness of detail with which I will not trouble the House, ends in words which I should not venture to use, but which I give as the expressions of an able and well-known officer, by characterizing the whole proceeding as a “sordid and degrading traffic.” As long as Parliament permitted the exchange of commissions, as exchange then was, and as it is to be again, all attempts to suppress that traffic proved equally futile. But at length, in the year 1871, Parliament was unwilling any longer to trifle with the violation of its statutes, and to palter with its own authority. It abolished the whole system root and branch, sale and purchase and exchange alike; it put the Commander-in-Chief on his honour to suppress the traffic. It put our officers on their honour not to continue the traffic; and when our officers are on their honour, you have a stronger guarantee than any written law or ordinance drawn with the utmost skill of the cleverest draftsman in the Inns of Courts, or of the most experienced clerk in our public offices. At this moment, for the first time for near 200 years, the influence of money is non-existent in our Army. And now comes the right hon. Gentleman, and asks us to give our sanction once again to the principle that a commission is a piece of property that may not, indeed, be sold, but may be bartered at its market value—that principle from which, as Royal Commission after Royal Commission has proved, and as our own common sense must tell us, many of the evil consequences of purchase inevitably flow. It is quite certain that rich men will buy exchanges from regiments where promotion is slow into regiments where promotion is quick. Officers will again purchase, not indeed promotion, but the prospect of promotion. Let us seriously consider what we are doing before we divert the attention of our young officers, even in part, from their professional studies and their professional duties, on which they are now exclusively intent, and encourage them once more to let the conversation of the mess-room run on such topics as the opportunities for promotion in their own as compared to other regiments, on their contributions to the regimental purse, on the objectionable qualities of the officer above them who refuses to exchange out of the battalion, and all the other miserable details of that haggling and huxtering dignified by the name of treaties and negotiations, which is little less than scandalous when the article in question is the command of men, with all the power for good and evil which that command places in the hands of those who possess it. And now it is well worth our while to consider the effect which this Bill will produce upon those salutary changes which have been introduced into the administration of our Army, with the approbation of both parties in this House. Some of the most important appointments in the gift of the Crown are the lieutenant-coloncies of our regiments. The discipline and welfare, and in time of war the honour and safety, of many hundreds of men are placed almost unreservedly in the hands of one individual. Without entering into ancient controversies, it will be universally admitted that under the Purchase system, the succession to these appointments proceeded by a course over which the State had very little control. Before 1871, the command of a regiment partook more or less of the nature of a freehold; and it was in order to buy out all existing claims, and to set the hands of the authorities absolutely free to choose the ablest, the fittest, and the most distinguished men for this most critical of all posts, that the nation was called upon to pay £7,000,000. And that great sum the nation undertook to pay; but it was on the clear understanding that, from that day forward, as long as England had an Army at all, the Commander-in-Chief should have full power to name any officer of suitable rank to the command of any battalion, and that he not only should have that power, but that he should be under no restraint, moral or material, direct or indirect, which could hamper him in the exercise of it. In an Empire like ours—hon. Gentleman who sit around me may consider it an exaggeration—I believe that that power was cheaply bought at the price. But what does this Bill do? for it is with the Bill we have to deal, and not with Regulations of the War Office, which may be made one year and unmade another. It enables an officer who has been appointed lieutenant-colonel of a regiment, stationed perhaps on the north-west frontier of India, to offer an officer who is in command of a regiment stationed at York or Canterbury £1,000 to change their respective functions. Of course, I shall be told that the Horse Guards has it in its power to refuse the application; but the peculiarity of the purchase and exchange system—a peculiarity which, at the time, was well understood and acknowledged by the House of Commons—is, that where money interests are concerned, great and almost exclusive attention is necessarily paid to the private wishes of officers. When an officer comes to the Horse Guards with a story of his having received an offer, the rejection of which would be a serious loss to a struggling man with a large family, it is not in human nature—I am sure that it is not in official nature—to turn a deaf ear to his importunity. And the consequence will be, that a man who has been deliberately selected on account of his experience, his aptitude, and his ability for an Indian command, will be recalled to make room for an officer, very good and honourable, no doubt, and quite able to command a battalion for five years in a cathedral town in England, but not suited by local knowledge and personal character to be responsible for the duties of a border station in the Punjaub, where the fortunes of our Eastern Empire may some morning be at stake. So much with regard to the bearing of the Bill upon the highest regimental command. But the same objections run through its relations to all ranks. Among the most vital, and undoubtedly the most popular, of the recent changes was the linking of battalions for home and foreign service. This great reform was purchased at a large sacrifice of regimental sentiment and tradition, a sacrifice which it was highly to the credit of our officers to make. But it was purchased besides at a cost of money second only to the cost of the abolition of Purchase, if, indeed, it be second only to that. What with the outlay of capital upon the buildings and training grounds of our depot centres, and the annual increase of the Estimates occasioned by the formation of a multitude of local staffs, the expense will, in the end, be so vast that nothing will recoup it, except the immense economy and the inestimable military advantage of placing in the hands of our authorities, the power freely to exchange men and officers between the home and the foreign battalions which have been linked into one corps. But if this Bill becomes law, that power will exist in name, but not in fact. Suppose the case of a regiment whose 1st battalion is quartered at Rangoon, and whose second battalion is quartered at Exeter. A young officer who prefers shooting woodcocks in Devonshire to feeding the mosquitoes in Burmah pays £1,000 to a comrade to sail in his stead. As time goes on, when the ranks of the battalion abroad are thinned by illness, it will become the duty of the Horse Guards to supply the place of the officers of the 1st battalion who are invalided in Burmah, by sending out officers from the 2nd battalion at home. But those officers will have bought the right of staying in England by a sacrifice of large sums of money. And it is quite idle to tell us here, in order to induce us to pass this Bill, that the military authorities will take no notice of these pecuniary transactions, and will make officers sail, whether they have purchased the right of staying at home, or whether they have not. All I can say is that, if such a course is taken, these officers will go to their duty abroad under a grievous sense of injustice, which I am not prepared to call unfounded. By bringing in this Bill, you have directly encouraged them to invest their money in securing the right of avoiding foreign service. You have said, in as plain words as a Government can say, that such an investment is legitimate, and is intended to attain its object; and if you break faith with these officers by sending them on foreign service—for a breach of faith you may be well assured that they will call it—you will raise up an amount of disaffection far deeper and more permanent than that which, by this inauspicious measure, you are seeking to allay. On the other hand, if you shrink from sending officers abroad at all times and to all places that the exigencies of the service demands, what becomes of the enormous outlay which Parliament sanctioned when it passed the Depôt Centres Bill of 1872? Hon. Gentlemen who then voted for that Bill, and who now vote for this, must find what answer they can make to the country, and, what is much more serious, to their own judgments; but I, for one, will never consent to be a party to the responsibility of so wantonly and lavishly throwing away so much of the nation's money. It is not till these considerations, which I have feebly set forth, are answered, that the House can be assured that it is not undoing its own work. I have the most sincere respect and, if he will allow me to say so, a high regard for the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War; and it will give me real pain if, in days to come, it is said—as if this Bill becomes law it will infallibly be said—that Lord Cardwell abolished Purchase, and that the right hon. Gentleman, as I believe most involuntarily and unconsciously, did his best to restore it. And now I must ask the House to reflect for a moment upon the effect which this Bill will have on the regimental system of our Army. There was a time when those words were frequent in the mouth of hon. Members. In the course of the Session of 1871, our regimental system got its full meed of praise. One noble Lord called it “the best regimental system in the world.” Another hon. Member told us that it had “never failed in the British Army;” while a third appreciated it so highly, that he characterized it as “the one part of our military organization which had never broken down.” In the face of the rows of hon. and gallant Gentlemen who sit opposite, I shall not venture to give my own views as to the operation for good or evil of the Bill upon this boasted, and justly boasted system, but I will quote the opinion of one to whose words every English civilian listens with respect, and every English soldier with veneration. On the very eve of his departure for those

Indian campaigns which were to raise his name to one of the most eminent in the annals of our history, Lord Clyde left behind him as a legacy his recorded judgment as to the military results of the system of exchange—

“Anything,” he says, “would be an advantage that would cause men to remain in our regiments abroad who now get away from them by exchange or otherwise. There is no reward to an officer who stops with his regiment and does duty with it that you ought not to give him. It is for the happiness of regiments both in their moral and military character. There is no sacrifice too great for the State to make to those men who will remain with their regiments in every colony, and above all in India. Anything that would distinguish an officer for having served abroad and continued with his regiment, in climates where we would not go unless our duty called us, could not but have a beneficial effect. I had one of the nicest corps of officers when I was ordered out to China; all those men embarked with their regiment, but as soon as that service was over, and they had to remain in a climate like that of China, most of them immediately exchanged, and I lost my young friends whom I so much loved.”

I cannot believe that those hon. Gentlemen who in the Session of 1871 sung the praises of our regimental system hour after hour and night after night, until the surfeited pen of the reporter at length abjured its task, will now vote for a Bill brought forward for the purpose of giving legislative sanction to that very practice which the greatest soldier of our own generation has pronounced to be fatal to those objects for the value of which the regimental system exists. And now, in conclusion, I will say a few words on the effect which this Bill will produce on something which should be, and is more precious in the estimation of the House than even our regimental system—I mean the military spirit of our Army. When speaking on this subject I will endeavour, as I am sure every hon. Gentleman who succeeds me will endeavour, to be very guarded in my language, and to refrain from any expressions that may be distasteful to officers in this House, and still more to the far larger body of officers who have no seat on our benches. And in order to give a surer guarantee than can be afforded by any such promise with regard to the future, I trust that the House will allow me to take this opportunity of making amends in relation to the past. I am only too conscious that in old days I used words that were harsh and inconsiderate when speaking on this and kindred questions, and especially I regret one sentence, of a somewhat epigrammatic turn, about officering our Army with the froth of society which has formed the title of a bulky pamphlet, and which has been quoted so frequently since that I cannot doubt that it gave pain at the time. My excuse is, that the sentence in question was spoken, not in this Parliament, nor even in the last Parliament, but that it was uttered in the course of the first speech deserving the name of a speech which, as a young and inexperienced politician, I had the honour of making in the presence of this the most formidable of all audiences. And as another excuse, which, I am sure, will find acceptance with British officers, it was uttered in the almost despairing ardour of an assault upon that which nearly every one besides myself at that time regarded as an impregnable position. Having said this much, I will put a case to the House, and earnestly request it to give to that case its gravest and most minute consideration. An officer serving at home is willing to exchange to India. In the battalion to which he desires to exchange there are two officers anxious to come home. One is an unmarried man, who thinks that in England he will have a better chance of promotion, and knows that he will have a pleasanter and more varied life. The other is a married man with a wife and family, whose health suffers from a residence in India, but who, from the very fact of his being a married man, is unable to find the sum of money which his comrade can easily procure. Under any well-regulated military system it is the older and less wealthy man who would be permitted to exchange Indian for English service, but under the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman—this Bill which we are required to believe would be of much benefit to poor officers—it is the younger and richer of the two who would infallibly carry the day. I say the richer, because this Bill will once more introduce the unfortunate necessity of distinguishing between rich and poor officers which was one of the most disagreeable and demoralizing results of Purchase. In other professions, when we speak of a man as rich or poor, we refer to his success or failure in his profession. We do not insult gentlemen engaged in other callings by allusions to the allowances which they get from their fathers, or the legacies which they expect from relations. But now that the right hon. Gentleman has brought this question before us, we are forced once more to talk of officers as rich and poor in worldly goods, whereas the only matter which concerns us is, whether they are rich or poor in professional skill, knowledge, and ability. And now, having made this short defence of myself for referring to the private circumstances of our officers, for which breach of delicacy the right hon. Gentleman is responsible, I beg to ask the House, whether it would not be utterly destructive to the military spirit of any Army if rich men were able to buy themselves off active service in the field? And if that is so, why should it be less destructive to military spirit that rich men should be able to buy themselves off, not from that which all our officers equally desire and covet, the opportunity of signalizing themselves in the face of an enemy, but from that which they all equally dislike—prolonged service in an unpleasant or unhealthy station? Lord Clyde assents to the assertion that “there is a great readiness among our officers to go on service of any kind, but a great unwillingness to stay in an unhealthy climate where there is nothing to be done;” and I am glad to shelter myself behind his immense authority when I say that the truest courage consists not in going willingly to the field of battle—that courage is too common, or rather too universal among our officers to need any special praise or encouragement—but in enduring, month after month and year after year, the tedium of exile in dull and distant quarters, and the wearing depression of a residence in insalubrious climates. In all nations during the period of their national vigour, it has been held that rich officers should take their full turn not only of dangerous but of disagreeable duty with their poorer brothers. The feeling on this subject in the army of old Rome, the conditions of whose service resembled ours more closely than those of any other Army in the world’s history, are well expressed in those fine lines, which I am sure are familiar to the right hon. Gentleman—

“Hic petit Euphraten juvenis, domitique Batavi
Custodes aquilas, armis industrius; at tu—

The right hon. Gentleman is far too good a scholar to require to be reminded of the epithets with which the satirist rebukes the young patriot who leaves his less fortunate comrades to endure the winter rigours of the Danube and the summer heats of the Assyrian frontier while he spends regiment in the West Indies to a regiment at Aldershot. Every career has about it disagreeable drawbacks, which men would, if they might, pay money to avoid; and neither the eloquence of the right hon. Gentleman, nor the ingenuity of his great Leader, can rescue the covering letters of the Generals showed in the strongest way its existence and depth, and he might, if required, quote passages from several of them in corroboration, as, for instance, from those of Lord Strathnairn, General Steele, General Horsford, and General Greathed. He would, however, only detain the House by reading a passage from the covering letter of General Sir Hope Grant, in command of the School of Instruction at Aldershot—a camp which included the largest body of troops collected at any one place in this country. General Sir Hope Grant said—

“I am fully convinced of the strong feeling of discontent and dissatisfaction which prevails among regimental officers upon this subject. This is mainly owing to the idea that their case has never been fully gone into before a military tribunal. Without some such investigation I am satisfied that this feeling will increase in intensity. . . . And I think that a Royal Commission, before which the officers could unfold their views, would do more than anything else could do to allay the feeling which now so unfortunately prevails.”

Other commanding officers bore equally strong testimony. The next step in the history of the Bill was a Motion for an Address to the Crown praying for the appointment of a Royal Commission. That Motion was made in “another place” by the Duke of Richmond, and it was carried by an enormous majority of 83, the contents being 129, and the non-contents; 46. Almost the whole of the minority were Peers officially connected with the Government, the few, he thought only 11, who were not so being either newly-created or Liberal riband-decorated Peers. Many Peers who usually acted with the late Government voted against them. What said His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge on that occasion? The House might be sure that he would not have spoken as he did unless he felt strongly on the subject. He said—

“Nothing would induce me to utter one word on this occasion if it were not that I feel called upon to point out in the strongest manner to every Member of this House that anything more detrimental to the interests of the Army, to the interests of the service, or to the interests of the country, than to have a discontented set of officers it is impossible to conceive. Therefore, I hope, whatever their Lordships may decide—it is not my province to interfere in any political question—your Lordships will decide with the object of putting an end to that discontent which I am grieved to say I believe does exist.

I think it is very much to be deplored that anything should engender among the officers of the Army a spirit of discontent . . . and I trust that the officers' claims will be dealt with, not so much according to the strict letter of the Act as according to justice and equity.”—[3 Hansard, ccvii. 636-7-8.]

Another noble Lord (Lord Hardinge), who had been Under Secretary of State for War, and who bore a name honoured among soldiers, read a letter from an officer, who said that the course taken by the late Government had been detrimental to the morale and injurious to the discipline of the Army. The result was, as already stated, that the whole House of Lords, with the exception of the Members of the Government and those connected with it, voted in favour of the Royal Commission. That Commission was, accordingly, appointed by the late Government. It consisted of men remarkable for their zeal, ability, and discretion, and they took the evidence of the Commander-in-Chief, General Airey, Sir Charles Yorke, late Military Secretary, and of other officers of rank and position. It had been pointed out by his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War that the subject dealt with by the Bill was the only one as to which the Commissioners appeared to entertain no doubt whatever. They cleared away the ground as far as it was concerned, and then passed to a question which they found more difficult to deal with, and as to which they went against the opinion of the officers. And it was worthy of remark that the Royal Letter appointing the Commissioners laid down most clearly and distinctly the terms within which it was considered they could exercise their discretion. It was, therefore, within the terms of a Letter, prompted by the then Secretary of State, that the three Commissioners—men said to be specially chosen for their ability, zeal, and discretion—exercised their discretion in the manner already pointed out to the House. He ventured to think that the argument that the Bill would resuscitate purchase in the Army was altogether unfounded. It had now done so in the non-purchase corps; and after the opinions of the military men he had quoted, opinions so strong and coming from persons who were responsible for the discipline of the Army, he could not but regard what had been said as to the bearing of the details of the measure upon poor or rich as being altogether beside the question, more especially as the poor officers had given evidence in its favour. It was, then, upon the question of which he had endeavoured to give this brief history that they were now asked to vote, and concerning which the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had thought it necessary to bring in this Bill, and what the House had to consider was, whether it would reject at once a Bill brought before it under the circumstances to which he had referred, and which was backed by such high authority. His right hon. Friend spoke not in his own name merely, but in the name also of those who were responsible for the discipline of the Army, and holding the responsible position he did his right hon. Friend could not have acted otherwise than as he had done. He would, had he done so, have been wanting in his duty to the Crown. He would go further, and say that if the late Secretary of State had been in his place in that House as Minister for War, he could not have avoided giving effect to the Report of the Commissioners. ["Oh, oh!"] He could not have avoided it. He (Lord Elcho), therefore, could not but think that the Opposition had chosen upon this question a very weak position for their battlefield—a weaker position almost than that which they took up a few days ago in respect of Ireland, and he was sorry his noble Friend (Lord Hartington), who had himself been Secretary of State for War, and who might and probably would again occupy that responsible position, had lent himself to the opposition to a measure that came before the House, recommended and sanctioned as this Bill was, and which had for its object the contentment of the officers and the discipline and efficiency of the Army.

MR. ANDERSON said, the able and exhaustive speech of the hon. Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan) had left very little to be said on the Opposition side of the House. He had had, however, considerable hope when the noble Lord (Lord Elcho) rose, that he would furnish some new argument to be answered, but new arguments had only been introduced to a very small extent indeed. The one new argument which Lord Elcho had brought forward was, that if Lord Cardwell had been in the House now, he would have considered himself bound by the Report of the Commission to support the present Bill. But he (Mr. Anderson), speaking from absolute knowledge, could say that after Lord Cardwell saw the Report of the Commission, he was decidedly hostile to the Bill of last year, which was identical with the one now introduced. But though Lord Elcho had not provided any new arguments, his speech would be very effective in damaging the Bill, for he had told them the Bill was founded on a policy of retaliation. [Lord Elcho: No, no!] The noble Lord had told them, at all events, that the measure sprang entirely from the discontent which arose in consequence of the mode in which the abolition of Purchase was accomplished, that abolition having been effected, not by the votes of the two Houses of Parliament, but by the exercise of the Royal Prerogative. The noble Lord now declared that that was not retaliation; but it appeared to be something very much like it. One of the strongest arguments which could be used against the Bill was, that when it was brought forward last year, he (Mr. Anderson) was its only ostensible opponent; but on this occasion, it was opposed by the united strength of the Liberal party. What did that change mean? for it was a very peculiar one. It simply meant that during the interval that had elapsed since the close of last Session, hon. Gentlemen had come to know what were the meaning and bearings of the Bill, and they had found out that it really aimed a very serious blow at the system of non-Purchase which was won with so much difficulty in the last Parliament; and that if it were passed, it would be certain to lead to the revival of some of these lapsed vested interests which did so much harm before. Of course, everybody knew that Purchase was abolished in opposition to the will of the Conservative Party, and, perhaps, it was not very wonderful that that party, now that they were in office, should seek to upset the decision against which they so strenuously fought. Equally, of course, in trying to re-impose Purchase, they made their beginning with the mildest form of the evil; but he hoped that would be seen through. He was glad, at all events, to see that the present Govern-

and sign a declaration on their honour that no over-regulation money was paid or received. He had no doubt that that restraint was effectual for a considerable time, and that when the authorities imposed it, they believed it would stop over-regulation altogether. But how did it end? Why, before long it was notorious that noblemen and gentlemen in an honourable profession, which considered itself the very soul and type of honour, systematically made and signed declarations upon their honour which they knew to be lies, and put the price of those lies in their pocket. That was the position to which careful guards brought the honourable profession of arms. Careful guards had failed before, and would, no doubt, equally fail again. They had now got quit of the stain, they had torn it out root and branch, and should take care that it was never restored. The right hon. Gentleman had stated that the Bill was founded on the Report of the Commissioners, and had read an extract from the Report, which he termed very decided; but he (Mr. Anderson) would read the same extract, in order to show that it was very undecided indeed. The Commissioners said—

"The new rule has obviously proceeded from an apprehension that to allow any pecuniary bargaining among officers with respect to their commissions might be as the letting out of waters bringing back Purchase, over-regulation prices, and the other incidents of the abolished system. We are not satisfied that there is any real danger of this, and we are satisfied, on the evidence before us, that a return to the old practice would be very acceptable to the Army."

The distinction between the phrases "We are not satisfied" and "We are satisfied," was in that passage very remarkable, and it was worthy of note that the Commissioners would not go the length of saying—"We are satisfied there is no danger." It was upon such a milk-and-watery utterance that the House was now asked to legislate. Such legislation might be accomplished by what Lord Elcho had styled a mechanical or tyrannical majority; but it would never be done with the approval of the people of the country, who had made great sacrifices to get rid of Purchase, because the vested interests it created had impaired the Army and prevented Army reform. Indeed, it seemed at one time as though the Army was made and kept up for the benefit of the officers, and not for the benefit of the country; and until the nation bought it back from the officers, at a very heavy price, it was impossible to do anything with it. It was full of fancy officers, who went in to make a pleasant plaything of the service, and though he admitted that such men never shrank from fighting when the opportunity came, it must be remembered that fighting was not the only duty of an officer, who had to go through a large amount of patient routine and discipline, which would make fighting more effective, but which was always irksome to officers. By means of the old system of buying and selling exchanges, rich officers used to be able to get rid of the irksomeness altogether, and practically selected their own stations for service; and that was a system which Parliament was now asked to restore. The country wanted officers who would be ready to go with their regiments wherever and whenever they were sent. If the matter of trafficking in exchanges was good for the Army, it must be equally good for the other services. A naval officer ordered off to the West Indies, but who dreaded cholera and "yellow Jack," would be stigmatized for life if he were, by a money bribe, to try and get another officer to take his place, in order that he might go home and enjoy the luxuries of life. A naval officer could not do such a thing; it was only to be allowed to the Army. It had been said that remarks of this kind were contemptuous of the officers of the Army as a class; but he disclaimed any such idea. He knew that the majority were patient, hard-working, earnest men, who loved their profession, and too often they saw prizes pass away to others who less deserved them. For these men he had nothing but respect. His animadversions were confined to the fancy officers, the aristocrat who went in to make a pleasant plaything of the Army, or the rich parvenu who went to obtain a social position which he could not otherwise attain. Such men were of no good to the Army, which would be much better without them; but it was to encourage those men that the present Bill was brought in. If such a measure was good for the officers, it would also be good for the non-commissioned officers and privates. The careful guards which were to be afforded would either permit superse-

sion, or bring in the system of purses. So long as the rule remained that the exchanging officer was to be the lowest of his rank in his new regiment, purses would be made up to induce a senior officer to exchange out of a regiment, for by that all below him would gain a step; and if, on the other hand, the exchanging officers simply changed places, and each stepped exactly into the place of the other, that would amount to supersession. Where there was a rich man ready to buy, and a poor man ready to sell, it would be most difficult to prevent corrupt practices, or practices contrary to law, from cropping up. In the Marine corps, for instance, which was supposed to be a strictly non-Purchase corps, a system of buying out officers had regularly gone on, and was known and winked at at headquarters. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) made a retiring scale, by which lieutenant-colonels might retire at the age of 51, but were compelled to do so when 54, unless made full colonels, and captains might retire at 45, but must do so at 48, unless made lieutenant-colonels; and the result was that when a captain was nearly 48, or a lieutenant-colonel was close upon 54, they looked about for some one in the rank above who was likely to retire, and bribed him by a money payment to do so. In conclusion, he must again express the hope that the present Bill would not be passed into law.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, that the hon. Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan) and other hon. Gentlemen opposite had described the measure as a relic of the old Purchase system, but he could say from his experience, which had been derived from residence in the Mediterranean, in the midst of a large garrison, that it was not, nor was it likely to lead to the introduction of that old system, for the system now proposed had existed in the non-Purchase corps, and it had not led to any traffic beyond the system of exchanges. The late Member for Bewdley (Colonel Anson) had shown, in a letter, that exchange had always existed in the Artillery, and yet, notwithstanding the existence of Purchase in the other branches of the service, exchanges had never had that tendency in the Ordnance Corps. It must be remembered that our Army was a volunteer Army; that, unlike any other existing Army, it was liable to expatriation; that you could not govern an Army by the laws of political economy; that you could not introduce labour into it by foreign competition; that you could not, in money value, give a fair day's wage for a fair day's work, and that the Army must be made attractive to men by bounties and pensions, and to officers by attractions of another nature. That end could never be accomplished if rules were to be maintained that were calculated to spread discontent; and it was to remove the cause of any such, that the Bill had been introduced. Why worry the man ready to pay, and the man anxious to be paid. In the French service money payments were recognized, as in the ranks, conscripts could pay for a substitute. It was in that way that the late Emperor kept so many veterans in his Army; they received the conscripts' money, and consented to extend their period of service. He must protest against the endeavour to run down what the hon. Member for Glasgow designated the "fancy" officer. It was expedient that country gentlemen having county influence, and others having independent fortunes, should be encouraged to enter the Army for a short time, for the sake of benefiting by its discipline both themselves and the localities in which they resided. The recent Conference at Brussels showed how much the foreign Powers having large Armies dwelt on the necessity of local organization. The articles submitted restricted the laws, rights, and duties of war to troops of any kind commanded by officers responsible for their subordinates conforming to the laws and customs of war, and forbade the constitution of an Army unless it was governed by men having a knowledge of those laws and customs. For these reasons it was well that men having independent means should endeavour to learn discipline, in order that they might command corps of Militia and Volunteers with an efficiency which was to be acquired only by service. What harm had ever resulted from these exchanges? Rich men were allowed advantages at present. They were allowed to pay the travelling expenses of poorer men who came home. Besides, if they did not wish to go to an unhealthy climate, they could retire without damage to their future prospects. If it did not damage the public service, they ought to encourage the introduction of richer men into the corps of the service. There was no analogy whatever between the Army, the Navy, and the Consular Service. A Consul was appointed specially to a particular place, not generally to the Consular Service. In the Navy, officers were entitled to refuse commands, and when they did accept, it was only for three years; whereas, officers in the Army were sent to a station for 10 years, and had frequently not only to live in the worst climate, but were not able to take away their families in bad seasons. He thought it a great pity that this had been made a party question. It was not so considered when the late Government appointed the Commission. If there were any bias in the minds of the two Judges who were appointed on that Commission, it must have been rather in favour of those who appointed them. Yet, in their opinion, exchanges would certainly not be detrimental to the service. The hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson), speaking on the first reading of the Bill, said—and it had since been echoed by the newspapers of his party—that it was a measure of retrogression and reaction. If so, it was the retrogression of common sense which retraced false steps and repaired administrative blunders. In his view it was, in the best sense, a measure of progress. It satisfied the officers without expense to the country, and increased the efficiency of the Army without augmenting the public burdens.

GENERAL SHUTE said, the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan) had put forth suppositions in his speech that evening which would be read with astonishment by every practical soldier. Many of his statements could have no possible foundation, except in his own imagination; but, no doubt, he had said some things which were of a little more importance. He (General Shute) would therefore disregard the "froth" of the hon. Gentleman and endeavour to answer his arguments. When he some four years ago was quartered in a manufacturing district, he was astonished to find that the majority of the people, believing in political agitators, compared the late Purchase system to their own bubble mining companies, which were always plausible in theory but nefarious in practice, whilst the Purchase system, if indefensible in theory, was admirable in practice; and he would say to the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) that if under the Purchase system an unfit man was ever promoted to the command of a regiment, it was the fault of that Commander-in-Chief who made the appointment. And if selection was to be the rule, the Commander-in-Chief must have the assistance of a council of general officers, or the Army, like the Navy, must be governed by a Board, the Secretary of State for War being the First Lord. But the fact was, the Army had no confidence in selection, for it would be impossible for any one man to select from the whole British Army, scattered so widely as it was. He was not aware, however, that the system of selection had been attempted even since the Army Bill passed. It seemed to be forgotten by hon. Gentlemen opposite that exchanges must receive the sanction of the Commander-in-Chief, and it was quite ridiculous to suppose that he could be influenced by considerations of "a wife and children" to send an utterly unfit man to an important command. An attack had been made by an hon. Member on our regimental system. He had attended the Autumn Manœuvres in Russia, Austria, and in France, and he knew that the regimental system of this country was the envy of all the other great Powers in Europe, and no doubt it was the finest in the world; but when it was said that non-commissioned officers and privates were not allowed to exchange, he must be allowed to say that they very often did. In the regiments he had commanded, it had often been allowed. [Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Do they exchange for money?] He really had not inquired into the matter; but if poor men, he should have been glad that they benefited by it. The late Government had been emphatically a Government of arbitration—the two Houses of Parliament differing, they had appointed a Royal Commission to inquire into the officers' grievances. He did not wish specially to uphold the Report of that Royal Commission, for they had not done the Army all the justice they ought to have done. But with regard to the exchange system, they had most decidedly reported in its favour, and, therefore, he was astonished that this was made a party question. In his opinion, the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the War Office had shown such consideration for regimental officers as they had not experienced for a long time before, and they looked upon this Bill as merely a small instalment towards the removal of one of the great grievances resulting from the Army Bill—a measure which was forced upon the Army and on the country by very questionable means, and contrary to the opinion of every practically good soldier in that and the other House of Parliament. This Bill, if passed, would confer upon them a very great boon. There was no fear of the Exchange system bringing in the Purchase system again, because the two things were entirely unconnected. In the Artillery, Engineers, and Marines, they had from time immemorial had the Exchange system, yet they had never adopted the Purchase system. The Exchange system was required, first, in reference to health. He had known many an excellent officer who had gallantly served his country in India and in the colonies, who, had he been exposed to a Crimean winter campaign, or to the wet and cold of a European bivouac, would have quickly died. He had known others who, unable to endure the intense heat of a tropical sun, had nobly fought our battles in colder and more northerly climes. There were many reasons arising from family and social causes which made it desirable that exchanges should be permitted in the Army, and he would repeat, that if the Bill should be accepted by Parliament it would remove a great and serious grievance—the result of over-legislation and meddling. The officers of the British Army, as a body of English gentlemen, must ever be loyal and true; but he admitted that there was a suppressed growl of discontent from the general officer to the drummer-boy which had gone with the men on furlough and with those who were discharged, which might seriously interfere with recruiting. The Conservative Party had often been twitted with owing their present position to the influence of Beer, Ballot, and Bribery. This position, however, might be more justly attributed to the support given them by the friends of the Army. The Army had no politics, and always supported the Government of the day; but there was hardly a man in England, from the noble to the peasant, who had not either himself served or had relations, connections, or friends in the Army; and he fully believed that at the last Election there was hardly one of them who did not oppose the late Government in consequence of their military policy. Now that the House had an opportunity, he trusted that some of those grievances of which the Army justly complained might be removed. The regimental officers who would be affected by this change deserved consideration. Our generals had, on occasions, failed us, the Staff had failed us, and the Commissariat had utterly broken down; but the regiments had never failed us. England's last great battle—the battle of Inkerman was won by the regimental officers, and he trusted, therefore, that the House would consider the wishes of regimental officers, for, as one of them, he could assure the House that they took the greatest and deepest interest in the Bill becoming law.

MR. W. E. PRICE said, he felt bound to oppose the second reading of the Bill; though, in doing so, he knew that he should be regarded as hostile by many of his military Friends. He agreed in every word that had been said in favour of allowing a perfectly free exchange between regiments abroad and at home; but he utterly failed to see how the provisions of the Royal Warrant of 1871 had, to any appreciable extent, interfered with that liberty, or how the officers had any just or reasonable cause of complaint. If he could see that that Warrant had interfered with the freedom of exchange, or if he thought that the Bill would conduce to the professional interest of officers or the general efficiency of the Army, he should vote for the second reading, in spite of certain obvious dangers that were incident to it; but exchanges were still constantly taking place, and the House could not have a better illustration of the fallacy of the proposals of the Government and of the unreasonable character of the complaints of officers than was contained in the letter of a late hon. and gallant Friend of his which had been previously alluded to in the debate. For his own part, he believed that exchanges were made with little less freedom now than they were before the date of the Royal Warrant. If it was not so, the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War would probably give them some information as to the number of exchanges which had been made during the last few years. He had tried to inform himself on this point by going through The Gazette of the last four years. Excluding exchanges in the Artillery and Engineers, and also the half-pay exchanges, which were not included in the Bill, he found that in 1870, two years before the Royal Warrant came into operation, and when the officers had no idea that any such disturbing measure was pending, 93 officers exchanged in the Infantry, Cavalry, Guards, and Rifle Brigade. In 1871 the number was 88; in 1872, the first year of the Royal Warrant, there were 90 exchanges. In 1873 there were 60; and, though he had not the figures for 1874, he believed they had not fallen far below the average. It must be remembered that in 1872 the rank of ensign was abolished, and therefore a large number of what would have been mentioned in The Gazette as exchanges were now simple transfers. If, however, any material falling off had occurred in the exchanges, might it not be explained by greater attention to their duties on the part of the officers and greater professional zeal? The rates of pay in India—which to officers in the higher ranks were four times, and to officers in the junior ranks were double the rates paid at home—caused a steady flow of exchanges to set towards India; and these exchanges, on the whole, were advantageous to the Army if left alone, and if men were not tempted by the offers of large sums of money. The service, however, would be greatly prejudiced if you raised up a class of officers who were ready to pay a large sum of money for the right to serve in a particular locality. This was the danger of the proposal now made by the right hon. Gentleman. He contended that the Bill was unnecessary, for he believed that exchanges took place as frequently as ever, and his own connection with the Army had shown him that there were “fast” regiments, in which officers were apt to exceed their means, and then to gain several thousands of pounds by exchanging. These were the officers who raised this demand, and he put it to the House whether it was worth while, for the sake of officers of that description, to institute such a change as was proposed. While the Bill was unnecessary, it was also inexpedient, because in an Army like ours, one-half of which at least was always abroad, serving in almost every degree of longitude, officers should not be allowed to raise up vested interests, if not in commissions, in their power to choose their place of service, thereby reverting in part to a system which, after infinite trouble, had been abolished. He believed that officers would club together, and would make a purse with which to buy out their seniors, and that vested interests would again spring up, and hamper and impede the working of the service. In all the debates on the subject in the last Parliament, by the public, and by the Press, it had been continually urged that great difficulties would have to be contended with in preventing the revival of Purchase. It seemed that the Government were determined somehow or other that that prophecy should be fulfilled, by fulfilling it themselves; instead of displaying firmness and determination to carry out loyally the wish of the country, as declared in 1871, that Purchase should cease in the Army for ever.

COLONEL GILPIN said, he was not surprised that those who did not belong to the Army should regard the present Bill as an attempt to revive in some degree the system of purchase; but he could not understand how hon. Members who had held commissions in the service could look upon it in that light. The hon. and gallant Gentleman, who had with so much ability seconded the Amendment, had served in one of the most splendid regiments in the service—a regiment which had distinguished itself whenever employed on foreign service; but, in general, its duties oscillated between Windsor and London, and at neither of those places were its services very arduous. It was therefore not surprising that the hon. and gallant Gentleman, when sitting in his club in Pall Mall, had not thought much of those officers who were doing duty in the West and East Indies. This was a matter which deeply interested the service, and if, in consequence of the proposed arrangement, officers should perform their duties with greater satisfaction to themselves, it would be a great advantage to the country. Among the men transfers were allowed, and that was calculated to render the service popular. He knew that that was the case in the Militia. He thought the hon. Gentleman's (Mr. Trevelyan) statement a little overdone when he spoke of Lord Cardwell's Act having been passed by the unanimous wish of the House. He (Colonel Gilpin) never knew of a measure which had been more opposed, or one which had given less satisfaction. It had weakened the service, and the very Government which had carried it had afterwards to appoint a special Commission to inquire into the mischief they themselves had occasioned. He thought the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary at War deserved a great deal of credit for the manner in which he proposed to carry out the recommendations of the Commission, and for doing so in a constitutional manner, without having recurrence to the use of a Royal Warrant. He protested against the interests of the service being subordinated to party tactics, and must express his intention of supporting the measure as likely to conduce to the satisfaction of the Army.

CAPTAIN HOPE-JOHNSTONE said, that, having had the honour to hold a commission in the Army, he wished to say a few words on a subject which so deeply affected the interests of the officers. During the last week or two he had met officers holding commissions in various branches of the service, and scarcely one of them had omitted to remark that he hoped that Bill would come safely through the House of Commons. Officers, like other people, were liable to become impecunious, or hard up, not necessarily through their own fault, but from unavoidable circumstances, and the particular individual might be a first-rate officer, who had served his country well, and if he had the opportunity proposed by this Bill of exchanging, both parties would gain an advantage, and the service, so far from being prejudicially affected, might retain an able man, who would otherwise have had to sell his commission. On the other hand, circumstances might arise to render it absolutely necessary for an officer to return home; but how could he effect an exchange in a bad climate unless he could hold out some inducement? The Bill was not an attempt to re-introduce the purchase system, nor to compel officers to pay large sums of money on exchange whether they liked it or not. It was simply a Bill to permit payment of money on exchange; and a Bill that need not necessarily affect anyone, but only those who wished to take advantage of it.

he fully believed that at the last Election there was hardly one of them who did not oppose the late Government in consequence of their military policy. Now that the House had an opportunity, he trusted that some of those grievances of which the Army justly complained might be removed. England's last great battle—the battle of Inkerman was won by the regimental officers, and he trusted, therefore, that the House would consider the wishes of regimental officers, for, as one of them, he could assure the House that they took the greatest and deepest interest in the Bill becoming law.

MR. W. E. PRICE said, he felt bound to oppose the second reading of the Bill; though, in doing so, he knew that he should be regarded as hostile by many of his military Friends. He agreed in every word that had been said in favour of allowing a perfectly free exchange between regiments abroad and at home; but he utterly failed to see how the provisions of the Royal Warrant of 1871 had, to any appreciable extent, interfered with that liberty, or how the officers had any just or reasonable cause of complaint. If he could see that that Warrant had interfered with the freedom of exchange, or if he thought that the Bill would conduce to the professional interest of officers or the general efficiency of the Army, he should vote for the second reading, in spite of certain obvious dangers that were incident to it; but exchanges were still constantly taking place, and the House could not have a better illustration of the fallacy of the proposals of the Government and of the unreasonable character of the complaints of officers than was contained in the letter of a late hon. and gallant Friend of his which had been previously alluded to in the debate. For his own part, he believed that exchanges were made with little less freedom now than they were before the date of the Royal Warrant. If it was not so, the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War would probably give them some information as to the number of exchanges which had been made during the last few years. He had tried to inform himself on this point by going through The Gazette of the last four years. Excluding exchanges in the Artillery and Engineers, and also the half-pay exchanges, which were not included in the Bill, he found that in 1870, two years before the Royal Warrant came into operation, and when the officers had no idea that any such disturbing measure was pending, 93 officers exchanged in the Infantry, Cavalry, Guards, and Rifle Brigade. In 1871 the number was 88; in 1872, the first year of the Royal Warrant, there were 90 exchanges. In 1873 there were 60; and, though he had not the figures for 1874, he believed they had not fallen far below the average. It must be remembered that in 1872 the rank of ensign was abolished, and therefore a large number of what would have been mentioned in The Gazette as exchanges were now simple transfers. If, however, any material falling off had occurred in the exchanges, might it not be explained by greater attention to their duties on the part of the officers and greater professional zeal? The rates of pay in India—which to officers in the higher ranks were four times, and to officers in the junior ranks were double the rates paid at home—caused a steady flow of exchanges to set towards India; and these exchanges, on the whole, were advantageous to the Army if left alone, and if men were not tempted by the offers of large sums of money. The service, however, would be greatly prejudiced if you raised up a class of officers who were ready to pay a large sum of money for the right to serve in a particular locality. This was the danger of the proposal now made by the right hon. Gentleman. He contended that the Bill was unnecessary, for he believed that exchanges took place as frequently as ever, and his own connection with the Army had shown him that there were “fast” regiments, in which officers were apt to exceed their means, and then to gain several thousands of pounds by exchanging. These were the officers who raised this demand, and he put it to the House whether it was worth while, for the sake of officers of that description, to institute such a change as was proposed. While the Bill was unnecessary, it was also inexpedient, because in an Army like ours, one-half of which interests, if not in commissions, in their power to choose their place of service, thereby reverting in part to a system which, after infinite trouble, had been abolished. He believed that officers would club together, and would make a purse with which to buy out their seniors, and that vested interests would again spring up, and hamper and impede the working of the service. In all the debates on the subject in the last Parliament, by the public, and by the Press, it had been continually urged that great difficulties would have to be contended with in preventing the revival of Purchase. It seemed that the Government were determined somehow or other that that prophecy should be fulfilled, by fulfilling it themselves; instead of displaying firmness and determination to carry out loyally the wish of the country, as declared in 1871, that Purchase should cease in the Army for ever.

COLONEL GILPIN said, he was not surprised that those who did not belong to the Army should regard the present Bill as an attempt to revive in some degree the system of purchase; but he could not understand how hon. Members who had held commissions in the service could look upon it in that light. The hon. and gallant Gentleman, who had with so much ability seconded the Amendment, had served in one of the most splendid regiments in the service—a regiment which had distinguished itself whenever employed on foreign service; but, in general, its duties oscillated between Windsor and London, and at neither of those places were its services very arduous. It was therefore not surprising that the hon. and gallant Gentleman, when sitting in his club in Pall Mall, had not thought much of those officers who were doing duty in the West and East Indies. This was a matter which deeply interested the service, and if, in consequence of the proposed arrangement, officers should perform their duties with greater satisfaction to themselves, it would be a great advantage to the country. Among the men transfers were allowed, and that was calculated to render the service popular. He knew that that was the case in the Militia. He thought the hon. Gentleman's (Mr. Trevelyan) statement a little overdone when he spoke of sure which had been more opposed, or one which had given less satisfaction. It had weakened the service, and the very Government which had carried it had afterwards to appoint a special Commission to inquire into the mischief they themselves had occasioned. He thought the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary at War deserved a great deal of credit for the manner in which he proposed to carry out the recommendations of the Commission, and for doing so in a constitutional manner, without having recourse to the use of a Royal Warrant. He protested against the interests of the service being subordinated to party tactics, and must express his intention of supporting the measure as likely to conduce to the satisfaction of the Army.

CAPTAIN HOPE-JOHNSTONE said, that, having had the honour to hold a commission in the Army, he wished to say a few words on a subject which so deeply affected the interests of the officers. During the last week or two he had met officers holding commissions in various branches of the service, and scarcely one of them had omitted to remark that he hoped that Bill would come safely through the House of Commons. Officers, like other people, were liable to become impecunious, or hard up, not necessarily through their own fault, but from unavoidable circumstances, and the particular individual might be a first-rate officer, who had served his country well, and if he had the opportunity proposed by this Bill of exchanging, both parties would gain an advantage, and the service, so far from being prejudicially affected, might retain an able man, who would otherwise have had to sell his commission. On the other hand, circumstances might arise to render it absolutely necessary for an officer to return home; but how could he effect an exchange in a bad climate unless he could hold out some inducement? The Bill was not an attempt to re-introduce the purchase system, nor to compel officers to pay large sums of money on exchange whether they liked it or not. It was simply a Bill to permit payment of money on exchange; and a Bill that need not necessarily affect anyone, but only those who wished to take advantage of it.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, he felt bound to oppose the Bill, although he did not do it on party motives, but simply because he did not think it would be for the advantage of the service or the country that it should become law. The hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Brighton had referred to the discontent that existed in the Army, and without accepting that opinion as implying any serious amount of discontent, still no one who had been lately on the Continent could deny the necessity of having a contented and well-disciplined Army, for it could not be doubted that the clouds which at present hung over Europe would some of these days burst, and no one could say how we might be situated. It should therefore be the object of Parliament to maintain an efficient and contented Army for the defence of the country and of her foreign possessions, especially looking at the rapid progress which the Russians were making in the direction of India, where sooner or later we would come into collision with that Power, but that could be secured by very different arrangements from those proposed to be based on this Bill. Had the Royal Commission, on whose Report they were asked to legislate, restricted their inquiries to those measures relating to pecuniary allowances in view to the settlement of complaints of officers by money payments, then the Commissioners would have been within their terms of reference, or even, if as regarded the practice of exchanges, the Commissioners had extended their investigations so as to have had all the facts before them, he would have been the last to disrespect the decision at which they arrived; but they had not all the facts before them, and it was to be remembered that a previous Commission had gone in a directly opposite way in deciding that this practice of exchanges was a part of the Purchase system, and could only be destroyed by destroying the whole rights of Purchase; that had been done, and now they were asked to legalize that which must re-introduce Purchase. In his opinion, the principle of the measure was wrong; it was giving a statutory right to that which was only possible through military orders at the discretion of the military chiefs, and therefore he must necessarily oppose it. As far as he could see, only 50 or 60 officers exchanged in the course of the year, and he could not, therefore, understand why the scheme for the abolition of purchase should be imperilled on such slight grounds. It was asked why the Opposition were opposing the Report of the Commission appointed while they were in power. It was because that Commission had not before it any witnesses who were not interested in the matter, for he could not regard the Commander-in-Chief and the Adjutant General as disinterested witnesses, and even those gentlemen who were called were not cross-examined. In this respect he must express his deep sorrow to see the neglect and indifference evinced by the War Office in not having some one to represent and protect the public interests in presence of the Commissioners. The representative of the officers (Sir Percy Herbert) had ably and successfully attended to the interests of the officers, but the War Office had failed to do so as regarded the public—even the Commissioners remarked on this omission. He thought it was a pity that this question was not settled when Purchase was abolished; but he could not forget the fact that the Duke of Wellington was opposed to exchanges, and that a favourite expression of his to all applicants for exchanges, when regiments were ordered abroad, was "Sell or sail." Beyond that, many of the most distinguished military authorities were opposed to exchanges except under circumstances of absolute necessity, and then on purely military considerations. He held that the pay of the officers of the Army was insufficient; but he did not think it was consistent with dignity, honour, discipline, or the finer feelings of men that the poorer officer should receive a pecuniary benefit at the expense of his wealthy brother officer. He considered the Government had no sufficient information to warrant them in bringing forward the Bill, and he thought the Secretary for War ought to have paused before he recommended the legalizing of a practice which must establish rights incompatible with that military authority which ought to exist over officers and men. There were two witnesses before the Commission who stated that exchanges were made by which officers gained large profits, and that fact showed that, whatever regulations were made, so long as the principle of paying money for exchange was recognized, those outside the War Office would be able to obtain advantages over those inside the office. It had been found that no regulations that could be made in regard to Purchase could put an end to the payment of over-regulation prices, and consequently it was on that conviction that the entire abolition of Purchase had been decided on. The same result would follow were exchanges recognized, for these exchanges would be made, as of old, with a view to secure military advancement. If the Secretary of State for War had read the evidence taken by the Duke of Somerset's Committee in 1857, he would have found sufficient evidence in regard to this matter to induce him to pause before he attempted to legalize a practice so full of danger. The Duke of Cambridge gave evidence to the effect, that so long as exchanges were allowed, the evils of the Purchase system could not be abolished, and Lord Panmure, who was then Secretary for War, also objected strongly to exchanges, while General Simpson mentioned the fact that the whole of the officers of a particular regiment had applied for exchange rather than go on foreign service. He had at the time the abolition of Purchase was decided on strongly urged the then thorough rooting out of the practice, and as he then thought and wrote, so he continued to think and to urge that the Army organization scheme should be completed by the payment of the whole money down to the officers who had invested money in buying of rank; that arrangement would be infinitely better than allowing private bargains to go on, by which officers could earn money to eke out their pay. In preference to that it would be better to increase the pay of the officers, in order that that means of gaining a subsistence might be rendered unnecessary. He admitted that economy could be practised in regard to the Army with advantage to the country and benefit to the officers, if they got rid of the wasteful extravagance which attended our Army administration. If the Government persisted in carrying this Bill, he earnestly hoped the right hon. Gentleman would be able to make such Amendments in the measure as would render it very harmless indeed; if money should be needed to carry out the Exchange Bill it should be public money, paid away to officers in a regular manner through the War Office.

CAPTAIN MILNE-HOME said, he felt, in venturing to offer a few remarks on this question, more than the usual diffidence which every Member must experience, when he had the privilege of addressing the House for the first time. He was aware that as an officer on full pay serving under Her Majesty, the Bill, which he hoped would be read a second time that night, might benefit him, therefore it was one in which he might be said to be interested. In the corps, however, with which he had the honour to be connected, exchanges were almost unknown, and as an impartial Member of Parliament he wished to give his testimony in favour of what he believed would be best for the interests of the Army. He could not attempt to follow all the speeches he had heard from the Opposition Benches, still less could he follow the hon. Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan) through all the details into which he had entered. But he would notice one or two of the observations of the hon. Gentleman. It was not the fact that any officer, rich or poor, had ever refused to serve Her Majesty in whatever climate, or against any enemy, and, therefore, he thought the argument of the hon. Gentleman broke down most thoroughly. The hon. Gentleman said the Secretary of State for War must prove that 50 years hence the Army would be better if the Bill passed; but did the late Secretary of State for War prove to the House that the Army would be better 50 years hence for the abolition of Purchase. If this Bill was passed, sub-lieutenant Jones at Rangoon might take the place of sub-lieutenant Smith at Exeter, but if Smith's regiment were ordered to India next year, Jones would have to go there with it. The hon. and gallant Member opposite (Mr. Hayter) had remarked that we were beginning rather early to reverse a part of the policy of the late Government; but, surely, if it were right to reverse that policy, the sooner we set about it the better. Moreover, the hon. Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan) said—"If we permit officers to exchange, why should we not allow non-commissioned officers and privates to exchange also?" Well, he had no objection to that suggestion being carried out, if it were changes as sanctioned by this Bill, as against the system of regimental exchanges altogether. It must be borne in mind, however, as had been repeatedly brought under the notice of the House, that though the Bill proposed somewhat to alter the system of regimental exchanges, they were already practised in the Army. Considerable differences of opinion on the subject of regimental exchanges were expressed in the course of the debates on the Army Regulation Bill in 1871. On the 31st of March, in answer to a Question put by Mr. Stapleton, then a Member of the House, Lord Cardwell said, there was no intention on the part of the Government to permit officers to give or receive money in exchanging from one regiment to another, or from or to half-pay; the Army Regulation Bill was meant to prohibit all pecuniary transactions in the Army. On the 22nd of May, when the Bill was in Committee, further discussion on the subject arose, and in answer to an Amendment moved by his hon. Friend the Member for North Wiltshire (Sir George Jenkinson), Lord Cardwell said, that there was every disposition on the part of the Government to consider the question with a view to make reasonable arrangements to facilitate exchanges in such cases as had been referred to; but they could not depart from the principle of not legalizing the payment of money by one officer to another as a consideration for the exchange. That showed a departure from the position deliberately taken up by Lord Cardwell in the beginning. In the course of the discussion in Committee there was a concurrence of testimony on the part of officers, that to prohibit money payments in all cases of exchange would be virtually to prohibit exchanges altogether. It was not necessary for him to take up the time of the House by recapitulating the very numerous items under which money payments for exchanges were sanctioned. In the course of the debate it seemed to have been gradually more and more assumed that exchanges would be effected on monetary, and not on military grounds. He could not, however, too emphatically repeat the declaration of his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War, that those exchanges would be governed by military considerations, and by military considerations alone. The Commander-in-Chief and his advisers would take care that such was the case. Some exception had been taken to the Bill, on the ground that it limited exchanges to officers only, and it was argued that it was a hardship that non-commissioned officers and men serving in an unhealthy climate should not also have leave to exchange. But so far as that objection was a good one, it applied with equal force to the arrangements which existed at present, and which related to officers alone. The fact was, that the position of officers serving in unhealthy climates was not precisely analogous to that of non-commissioned officers and men. Partly, however, by transfer from regiments—and his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Brighton (General Shute) had told the House of such cases having occurred to his own knowledge—partly in consequence of the short-service system under which men now enlisted, and partly from the greater facility of invaliding, the practical effect had been to do for non-commissioned officers and men that which it was the object of the Bill to facilitate for officers. The hon. Member for Tewkesbury (Mr. W. E. Price) asked distinctly how far the abolition of purchase and the consequent restrictions upon exchanges had really affected them. The best information it was possible for him to obtain did not enable him to make an exact comparison. But it appeared that in the two years before the abolition of Purchase there had been 159 exchanges, while the full-pay regimental exchanges since then, which extended over a period of more than two years, had been only 97. That was sufficient to show that there had been an effectual check on the practice of full-pay regimental exchanges. Some hon. Members appeared to be under the impression that, having regard to something said in the Report of the Over-Regulation Payments Commission, the practice of exchanges must necessarily be considered in connection with the over-regulation payments. A considerable change had been effected since that Report was made. It was true at the time of the Report, as stated by the Commissioners, that if an officer of one regiment found he could not get from his junior the amount of money to which he considered himself, according to custom, fairly entitled, he might, and sometimes did, exchange into another regiment, with the view of obtaining there the sum he desired. But at the present time his position was different. He had to go before the Army Purchase Commissioners, and whatever money he received for his commission was received wholly regardless of any exchange, or of any money which might have passed between him and another officer. What he got from them was the sum to which he had been entitled at the date of the Royal Warrant. As to what had been observed with regard to officers of linked battalions exchanging, he would observe that that system was based mainly upon the theory of having an equal number of battalions at home and abroad. But in a service like that of England, where there was a wide distance of sea to traverse, where transport arrangements had to be considered, and where, no doubt, troops had to be brought back, in some cases not from the best, but the nearest point, he must remind the House that the arrangements by which one battalion could be kept abroad and the other battalion at home, was liable at any moment to be disturbed by the exigency of a war suddenly arising, and he thought it was not too much to say that if a war were to arise, the changes necessary in sending battalions to the field would throw out the whole service for three or four years after the termination of the war. This was not an argument against the linked battalion system; but if he was to be told that by having one battalion at home and the other abroad, the result would be that the officers would not always have a choice of battalions into which to exchange, he preferred to be guided rather by practice than by theory. There was another point on which he wished to lay some stress—namely, that with regard to the Ordnance Corps, Artillery, and Engineers, although money had habitually passed for exchanges, yet the practice had never, in the slightest degree, led to officers being bought out under a system of exchange. Perhaps he might be allowed to anticipate an objection which might be raised as to exchanges between the different arms of the service. So far as he was aware, it had always been understood by those concerned that exchanges between the different arms—as, for example, the Cavalry and Infantry—were allowed in the lower ranks, but that in the case of officers who had reached positions of command, they were not allowed unless there were circumstances which showed the requisite qualifications were possessed. It had been pointed out that the system of five years' tenure of posts of high rank would be an assimilation to the system which existed in regard to Staff appointments, and that as regarded the latter, no exchanges had been made, it being doubtful, indeed, whether they would be allowed. But, inasmuch as the higher posts were held to be posts of selection, it could not for a moment be supposed that an officer selected to command at one place might not be equally able to command a regiment at another place. Doubts had been expressed as to the possible failure of the regulations under which it was proposed to allow exchanges to be carried on. All that he could say on that point was, that the House had heard the Secretary of State declare, under his responsibility as a Minister, that it was his intention to take whatever step might be necessary for the complete enforcement of the regulations. He would not weary the House by an account of the forms which had been observed in carrying out the exchanges, or of the alterations which it might be necessary to make in them. But he thought the House might rest assured that the regulations would be sufficient for the purpose for which they were intended, and that the Secretary of State would see that they were properly carried out. He wished, before he sat down, to correct a misapprehension under which some hon. Members seemed to labour. It was stated that it would be possible under the Bill for an officer in the position of a captain and lieutenant-colonel to exchange with an officer commanding a regiment. That, however, was an error, because there was a Warrant which distinctly said that an exchange could be effected only when there was corresponding Army rank. He might, perhaps, be allowed to add a few words personal to himself. He was, he believed, the only Member of the Conservative Party who voted in favour of the Abolition of Purchase Clause proposed by the late Government, and if he thought the abolition of Purchase would be interfered with by the present Bill, he should not hesitate to make the greatest sacrifice which a young politician could make, rather than take a course which would have that effect. It was, however, because he was satisfied there was no such danger, and because he wished to see a remedy provided for a grievance which the Commissioners regarded as a genuine grievance, that he was in favour of a proposal which would, he had no doubt, recommend itself to the country. He preferred, to use a common expression, an ounce of practice to a pound of theory, and, seeing there was a substantial cause of complaint, he desired to see it removed. By taking such a course, the House would be doing not only what was right in itself, but would be giving the officers of the Army the assurance that they might look to it with confidence for redress; and, entertaining those views, he gave the Bill his cordial support.

MR. LOWE: The hon. Financial Secretary to the War Office has told us, and the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State said the same thing—that he did not believe for a moment that this Bill would have the effect of bringing back Purchase in the Army. If it were a matter of the veracity and honour of those two hon. Gentlemen no assurance could be more satisfactory, and nothing more would be required. But weighed in the balance of probability, reason, and expediency, I must say, without any disrespect to those hon. Gentlemen, that I decline to accept their convictions in the place of the reasons and arguments which they failed to produce. The hon. Financial Secretary held out to us an inducement to pass the Bill, in the shape of an Order or Warrant which is to be issued; but the House must not look to the good intentions of the Government, but look at the measure itself as a piece of legislation. Warrants, we know, are things easily framed, recalled, and modified, and when modified, they will be sure to be modified in a manner to gratify the popular feeling for the time being prevalent in the Army. The question then comes back to this—what is the real nature of the proposal before us; and is it, or is it not, likely to promote the welfare of the Army and the good government of this country? The question before us has been, I think, a little lost sight of. The matter is very simple. In 1809, in the very crisis of a bloody and desperate war, and at, probably, the darkest hour of that crisis, the Parliament of that time had the magnanimity to enact that any pecuniary dealings in reference to the purchase of commissions in the Army, should render the parties liable to be cashiered, and the brokers concerned in it to be punished for misdemeanour, and that, too, at a moment when, if ever, it was most necessary to offer every inducement to officers to enter the Army. But there was a clause introduced qualifying that enactment, to the effect that if the parties agreeing for an exchange did agree under such regulations as might be made by His Majesty, as to the sum to be paid, then they should be out of the operation of the Act. Now, the present Bill does not authorize exchanges for that is done already; it does not require the consent of a superior authority to the exchange, for that, too, is done already; it does not authorize the payment of such necessary expenses as may be required, in order to enable a poor officer to take advantage of his right to exchange, for that, also, is already done; but the whole object of the measure is simply to repeal so much of the Act of 1809 as renders it necessary that the payment made shall be in accordance with the Regulations made by Her Majesty. The effect of the Bill, in short, will be neither more nor less than to give an unlimited licence of paying and receiving whatever amount the parties to the transaction may choose. Is the House to repeal the Act passed in the middle of the French War, and thus enable officers to give and receive larger sums than ever were contemplated by the Legislature of that day they should pay and receive? That is the question before the House, and all the arguments, therefore, which have been urged in the course of the discussion, as to exchanges being good things in themselves are altogether beside the subject. Yet almost every speaker on the opposite side of the House has addressed himself to the single point—the point that exchanges cannot take place as often as is desirable, unless the power to pay and receive large sums is given. Hon. Gentlemen who are in favour of the Bill content themselves merely with showing that which nobody seeks to deny—the advantages of exchanges in a large Army, such as that which this country possesses. They assign no good reason to a noble public spirit should be repealed, in order to legalize unlimited payments between officers, the fact being entirely ignored that the exigencies of mankind drive them to make exchanges with each other without any such payments. If one man wants to stay at home and another desires to go to India, what necessity, I should like to know, is there to break down those barriers which now exist, in order to enable the one to pay, and the other to receive, a large sum of money? The arguments, then, which have been urged on the other side so far, in my opinion, from making out a case in favour of the Bill, go in a contrary direction. Being unable to find any arguments in support of conferring the unlimited power which it is sought to give in the discussion itself, I am obliged to look back to the source in which the Bill has its origin—the extrajudicial deliverance of the Commission, which made a proposal on a matter which, I contend, had never been referred to it, and which concerned the discipline of the Army, with which I think it would have been better not to have interfered. The Commissioners advance several arguments, one of which is a mere assertion. They say, in answer to apprehensions of a return to Purchase, "We don't think so." They argue, as was done in the case of Bellarmine—Bellarmine says this. Bellarmine is a liar. So now that we have confuted Bellarmine, we will proceed. Nothing short of demonstration is so clear, as that what we are asked to do will ultimately set aside that which we had made so many sacrifices to attain—namely, the abolition of purchase. In the first place, they spoke of exchange and of the distinction between exchange and purchase, and they thought when they called the two things by different names, they had established a difference between them. But what is exchange? Exchange is the giving of one thing for another, neither of those things being money. Sale is the giving of money for some other article. Well, then, I ask, if I give a commission and money in exchange for a commission, why should we call that exchange more than sale? Money passes and a commodity passes. We choose to ignore the money we come closer and look at the substance of the thing, we cannot doubt that whatever the evils are that are inherent in sale, they are just as much inherent in a transaction in which I give a commission and money, as if I gave the whole in money. What are the evils of sale? They are the haggling, the bargaining, the brokerage, as the Act somewhat cynically calls it—the watching the turn of the markets, the touters who try to find out who wants to sell and who to buy. These things degrade a noble profession down to the level of the lowest practices of the Stock Exchange. It is sought to deny that the element of sale enters into exchanges; but I contend that for all practical, for all moral purposes, they may just as well be called sales as exchanges. The House is, in fact, virtually asked to legalize sales. It is assumed that the sale of a commission for a consideration wholly consisting of money is conduct so disgraceful that no penalty can be too severe for it; but in respect of contracts which consist partly of sale and partly of something else, Parliament is called upon to repeal the wise policy on which it has acted, and to say that that will be a proper and a legal transaction. This is what we are asked to tell the Army—"Here are two things; if one is guilty, both are; if one is innocent, both are; but we desire you to consider the one to be innocent and the other to be guilty." Can we believe the officers of the Army to be so simple as to follow the artificial line thus put before them, or to accept the monstrous proposition—that of two transactions absolutely identical in moral value, they should regard the one as innocent and the other as guilty, merely because Parliament says that it is so? It is manifest in respect of the two systems—the system of the sale of commissions veiled and coloured, and carried on under the form of exchanges, and the system of sale of commissions unveiled and open—that the prohibition of the one and the permission of the other cannot permanently go on together. The one must kill the other. Either the nobler element will prevail and put down the viler; or, what I fear as more probable, the viler will prevail, and be the means of breaking down the nobler, and setting up in its place the exploded doctrine of Purchase. It is said—"Oh, but we will maintain our law of prohibition." Well, my humble experience shows me what is the value of a law of prohibition, when the interests and passions of mankind run counter to it. The most solemn obligations, the most binding oaths that could be administered to human creatures have been disobeyed, universally I might say, and that by men who probably on all other subjects are miracles and paragons of honour, chivalry, and virtue. With that lesson before us, we must remember that what we really have to trust is not so much laws and institutions as to the spirit we may infuse by them. If we break down the dislike for these transactions which we are trying to create and infuse into the Army, we shall, with it, really break down the only safeguard on which we can rely to prevent the return of those evils of which we hoped we had got rid. Therefore I look forward, notwithstanding the authoritative declaration of the Commissioners—"that they don't think so"—if this policy be carried out, with very great confidence to this—that it will break down the whole system we have been building up, and we shall, by having Purchase legalized in one case, have it legalized generally by a tacit understanding. Everything will then return to its own old state. That puts me in mind of the interview between the First Consul, Napoleon, and the celebrated traveller, Monsieur Volney. Napoleon said—"Well, you see, Monsieur Volney, everything returns to its old state." "Yes, First Consul," said M. Volney, "everything except the 3,000,000 Frenchmen who have died in order that these things might not return." So I say it will be in this case, if the Bill is forced, as it may be, through this House. Everything will return to its old state, except the £7,000,000, which in that case we have thrown away upon the abolition of Purchase. But the Commissioners argue that what is proposed ought to be done, because the Army wishes it. Well, I quite admit it is undesirable that we should disregard the wishes of the Army in this or any matter; but, at the same time, I entirely decline to say that we have arrived at a point when we should take the wishes of the Army as a guide in questions of right and wrong. The Army—and I say it with all respect—is like fire—a good servant, but a bad master. No doubt, the public opinion of the Prætorian Guards was entirely in favour of the selling of the Roman Empire, but I question very much whether posterity will ratify that verdict, and agreeable as it was to themselves in the first instance, it did not turn out entirely to their advantage, as they discovered when Severus decimated them. So, in the present instance, I apprehend we have better means of knowing and judging what is for the advantage of the public than the Army, and if we believe they take a mistaken view of what is for their good, it is our business and bounden duty to disregard any unpopularity, any clamour that may arise, and do fearlessly what we think is right. Then there is the other ground that has been urged, and that is with regard to India. It is said to be extremely convenient that exchanges should be made to India. That is perfectly true, and therefore provision has been made for exchanges. But that only illustrates this, that there are already such enormous conveniences prompting and pushing men towards these exchanges that there is no necessity for the additional stimulus of pecuniary inducements. In the letter that was read, a poor man in this country without a shilling is spoken of who has an excellent constitution and a desire to go to India, and on the other hand, we have a man in failing health in India, with a sickly wife and family, anxious to return. Does the House think that an exchange could not be managed between those men without the intervention of a pecuniary consideration? Where things will move naturally there is no need to accelerate their motion. It is only where they will not move that such a step is at all justifiable. Then there is the last and most striking assertion of all, of which I will speak lightly, for the admirable speech of my hon. Friend the Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan) has really covered the whole ground—namely, that the proposal is for the good of the service. But will it prove to be so? I must be permitted to say that it does appear to me that hardly anything can corrupt our soldiers and officers. The material out of which they are made is so good that they are proof against trials and temptations which would be the ruin of any other set of men in the world. If I wanted to devise a scheme utterly demoralizing to the Army, disgracing officers in the sight of their men, and making the men turbulent, discontented, and disobedient, I could not imagine any scheme better than that which is exhibited when a regiment goes to India. What I understand takes place is this. The thing is generally foreseen by gentlemen of good connections with friends in high circles; they have generally long intimation before the event takes place; they take their measures accordingly, and they gradually deliver themselves from the prospect of going to a horrid foreign climate. As Nym and Bardolph said of the bridge in Henry V., "The humour of it is too hot"—and they do not choose to go to India. Then there are gentlemen of a lower grade of society who cannot be so well informed; they have not time to take these preliminary steps, and, of course, they go to India. But having money in their pockets it is wonderful with what facility they return to England. Thus the spectacle is presented to the soldiers in India of officers by whom they have been drilled, and to whom they have become attached, just because of the change of climate leaving them in the lurch, some of them deliberately beforehand and others almost as soon as they have got to their destination, one by one, at a time most trying to the soldier, when he has got to undergo all the things to him most new and strange—heat, insects, and ennui. The soldier is, in fact, deserted by all who should support him and handed over to strangers of whom he knows nothing. Is that the way in which we are to promote the good of the service? Is that the way in which you are to bind your officers and men together? And if, by reason of the extraordinary goodness of the material, it does not have all the evil effects which it may have, can we shut our eyes to the necessary consequences of such things? And that leads me to one other consideration which is in my eyes higher than all, and of which I can speak more freely, as it is not purely technical, and that is this. Mischievous as is this system—great as is the waste of money—great as is the injury it is calculated to produce on the service—I look upon all these things as being slight in comparison with the mischief of the principle you are about to establish. I would not struggle so strongly against it as I do, were I not satisfied of the evil it will work. Government in their didactic capacity are poor, very poor, teachers. How often is the Proclamation against Vice and Immorality read, but did it ever prevent a person from stealing a sixpence, or is any one the better for it in any way. When the Government go forth to tell people what they should do, they are like Wisdom "lifting up her voice in the streets"—no man regards them. But, on the other hand, let the Government, with all the power it wields, and the influence it can command, uphold any unsound or mischievous principle, and mark what then becomes of it. There is nothing unsound or mischievous which a Government cannot plant among its people and root strongly, provided it sets itself deliberately to do so. In the reign of Edward VI., people did not know how to read and write, they were not so enlightened as they are now. People were burnt at the stake; they used torture freely; persons were hung, drawn, and quartered for very slight offences; slavery was in existence; they did not know whether the earth went round the sun or the sun round the earth. But they knew and recognized one thing, and that was, that the sale of a public office was a gross outrage against public morality. They knew one thing, which many of us have forgotten, and that was, that a public office ought to be held for behoof of the public; that it was not a property, but a trust and a duty; that it was not an object by which a man was to make money; that it was not, in fact, a thing to be bought and sold; but was a much higher and holier thing, a thing not to be held for the sake of the man in office, but for the good of those for whom the office was held. These simple, half-barbarous men understood nothing but this—that if a office was a property, then sell it; but if it was a duty, then do it. And so it will be found, that in the reign of Edward VI., while they permitted the sale of a freehold office, because it was a property, they distinguished it altogether from an office of trust or an office of a judicial character. That statute does not touch the present question, because a standing Army, as we have it now, did not then exist; but nobody can doubt that it would have touched it, if such an Army had existed. That statute has remained unrepealed from that time to the present; and so good is it thought that, as I have said, in the year 1809, when we were in the agony of our war with Napoleon, so far from breaking down the rule in order to attract rich men into the service, Parliament took the opportunity of extending that rule, which we are now asked to take away. That has been our conduct up to this time; and now, in the fulness of our wealth and prosperity, when there is no difficulty of getting any number of officers, we are asked, at this time of day, under the cynical name of "brokerage" to repeal these Acts. Why, Sir, I abhor the name of brokerage. As far as I know it has been a term of the vilest abuse, and I should have thought it would have been the very last name adopted in any Act of Parliament for a practice which Parliament considers should be respected. I remember Junius said of the Duke of Grafton, when he wished to lower his character, that, "he had degraded his position down to being a broker of commissions." Now, Sir, that is the very object of this Bill. We are to do away with the Acts which prevent the brokerage of exchange. Honest Troilus in Shakespeare, shall speak for me in his own plain language—

"Hence, broker, lackey! ignomy and shame, Pursue thy life, and live aye with thy name."

And that is the actual term that the House will be expected to use in an Act which it may, and very likely will, adopt. But does the House think that they can do that without doing enormous mischief? What I urge upon the House with regard to the impossibility of working, side by side, a system of absolute purity in regard to the sale of commissions, and absolute venality in the matter of exchanges, may be urged with even greater force when we speak of the rest of the community. What is the feeling of mankind, what would be the feeling of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War himself, or of the First Lord of the Admiralty? Suppose there are two clerks in either of their offices who come to what is called a question of pecuniary inducement for exchange. Suppose that one is to give the other—say, £100—to exchange places, and suppose—I do not put it offensively—the right hon. gentleman consents to that proposal, and it comes to the knowledge of the House. What would the House say to it, or what would become of the right hon. Gentleman? How long would he be at the head of the War Office or Admiralty, or how long would the clerks be allowed to remain in their offices? Suppose two Judges—one Judge A in the Court of Common Pleas, and Judge B in the Queen's Bench, who is overworked. Suppose Judge B giving Judge A £2,000 for an exchange of offices, and the Lord Chancellor giving his consent to the transaction—how long would they remain Judges, or how long would he be Lord Chancellor after it came to the knowledge of the House? I would ask in all seriousness, whether we should not resent it as the greatest insult that could be offered to us, if it could be supposed for a moment that we could enter upon such a transaction ourselves, or sanction them in any of those over whom we have jurisdiction? I want to know what the Army has done that they should be placed on a lower moral level than anyone else? I have heard that "What in the captain is a choleric word, is in the soldier flat blasphemy;" but I never heard before that what would be in the right hon. Gentleman or any other Minister a gross piece of corruption, which would cover him with ignominy, is to be tolerated in another Department. If that public office is venial, why let us make a good thing of it and put up all the offices of the State for sale by auction. We may in that way save all the salaries, because the employés would pay themselves by robbing the public. If, however, we are not prepared to adopt that principle, and if we adhere to the idea of Edward VI.'s time—that it was not right that offices should be sold as property, and that they are held for the good of the State, let us not throw on our noble Army the disgrace of being subject to the infamy of practices which we would not allow to be done by ourselves in other Departments. I have now done. I have endeavoured as far as I can to raise this question out of mere military technicality to one of morality and public spirit. It is no doubt a ridiculous thing that, in this age, any one should think of anything being unfit to be bought or sold. It may be thought romantic and unbusinesslike that any such doctrine should be broached but I hold it nevertheless; and I venture to believe, and I assert it, notwithstanding all the ridicule that it may bring down upon me, that there are, at least, three things which ought not to be bought or sold: one is the virtue of a woman, another is the integrity of a statesman, and the third is the honour of a soldier.

MR. HUNT said, that after the animated oration they had just heard, the remarks he had to offer would, he feared, appear to be very tame and flat, because he should have to represent the "vile," while the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe) claimed to represent the "noble" element in this question. He must ask the House, in other words, to come down from the clouds to a little near the earth, and, to allow him to ask whether the Bill was the atrocious measure referred to in the glowing periods of the right hon. Gentleman. He did not like to throw himself like an armed advocate into the contest—not that he was not in favour of the present Bill—but because he had taken up a very responsible position as one of the Commissioners to inquire into this matter, and the feeling he had when he sat with Lord Justice James and Lord Penzance was altogether one of judicial responsibility. That feeling still pervaded his mind, and he might therefore seem perhaps to speak with some coldness on the matter. The hon. Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan) had sought to disparage the authority of the Army Commission by referring to a previous Commission which had sat on this subject. The hon. Member read a sentence from the Report of the Over-Regulation Price Commission, and he asked the House whether it could trust the opinions of Gentlemen who had given utterance to such sentiments?

MR. G. O. TREVELYAN said, he had cast no reflections upon the Commission of Sir George Grey. He agreed, on the contrary, with every single word of the passage he had read; but he contended that it was incompatible with the Report of the Commission of 1874, on which the present Bill was based.

MR. HUNT was glad to accept the correction. He (Mr. Hunt) had understood the hon. Gentleman to point to that sentence as incapacitating those who were parties to it, and he was very glad to find that the hon. Gentleman did not entertain that view. All he could say was, that the Report of that Commission was framed by Sir George Grey, whose name could never be mentioned in that House without respect, and it was signed by all the Commissioners. With regard to the Commission on Officers' Grievances, he (Mr. Hunt) was told by Lord Cardwell, when he asked him to become a Member of it, that it was in the nature of a judicial Commission, and it was in a judicial spirit, that in concert with his Colleagues he entered upon his labours. What was it their duty to do? To be guided by the evidence, and it was on the evidence contained in the book in which was to be found the Report, that he rested the case for this Bill. They had been told that they only heard evidence upon one side, and that if the witnesses had been cross-examined, a very different state of things would have been made out. Well, though no person was present to cross-examine the witnesses in a hostile sense, he thought he might say the witnesses were cross-examined very severely by the Commissioners themselves. It was said that the Commissioners assented to everything that was brought forward by ex parte witnesses. Those who made that charge he thought had not very well studied the evidence together with the Report. What was the fact? That the Commissioners rejected a great many of the claims that were brought forward by officers. The claims of a large class of officers were set aside by the Commissioners, the class of officers in whose favour it was said this Bill was introduced—namely, the more wealthy class of officers, because they repudiated the claims of the Foot Guards and of the Household Troops, and said they had no case on which they could stand. And yet the House was told the Commissioners only had ex parte evidence before them, and, therefore, their judgment was not to be regarded as worth anything. He regretted, exceedingly, that one of his Colleagues on the Commission was not at present addressing the House. He regretted that the Commission had not an abler representative than himself. The House had been told by the hon. Member for the Border Burghs, and by the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down, that this was an extra-judicial decision of the Commissioners with regard to the introduction of exchanges. He (Mr. Hunt) maintained it was not, and he might, therefore, inform the House how the Commissioners dealt with the matter. They had to consider the grievances which the officers alleged in their memorial, and whether any compensation, and what compensation, was due to them. Well, the Commissioners were convinced, at an early stage of the inquiry, that the officers had made out a case of grievance by reason of the abolition of the old power of exchange, and that it was their duty, of course, to consider whether any compensation should be awarded on account of that. Then, in looking at this question, they said—"But is this question of exchanges necessarily involved in the abolition of Purchase? Does the principle which governs the Warrant abolishing Purchase really affect the question of exchanges?" And he believed they could hardly deal with the whole subject without considering that particular question. He could say this for himself, that he had no yearning for a restoration of Purchase. He never thought that Purchase in the Army could be advantageous in principle. He certainly thought at the time—and he thought now—that the abolition of Purchase would entail an immense burden on the country. He never thought that abolition should be achieved at the expense of the officers instead of at the expense of the country; and he believed that when the ultimate result of the abolition of Purchase was known, the predictions of those who took that line of argument would be fully maintained. Apart from that, he said, he had no affection at all for the system of Purchase. He was quite sure his Colleagues on the Commission entertained the same views as himself on that subject. As he said just now, the Commissioners had to look at the evidence, and he denied that it was exclusively ex parte evidence. Though there was no one to represent the Government before the Commission, the Commissioners called all the most experienced persons in the administration of the Army before them. They had before them the Commander-in-Chief, the Adjutant General, and the Military Secretary. He would not trouble the House with reading their evidence, because it had been quoted from very largely. They agreed that the old system of exchange was beneficial to the service as well as beneficial to individuals. Well, the House had been told to-night that this was a measure in favour of the rich man and against the poor man, and descriptions had been given of the hardships the poor man would endure if this measure were allowed to pass. That was not at all the impression he had derived from the evidence that was given before the Commission, not only with regard to the question of exchanges, but with regard to the question of the abolition of Purchase. It had been proved, he thought, abundantly, that those who were likely to suffer most were the poor officers of the Army in the case of the abolition of Purchase. It was proved with regard to exchange that the poor officer would suffer equally with the rich as long as the Regulations of the Warrant were adhered to. He thought there were one or two passages that bore on this question in the evidence that had not been referred to by hon. Gentlemen. At all events, while he had been in the House he had not heard them quoted, and he hoped the House would allow him to read them. An officer in the 78th Highlanders, in answering Question 994, said—

"The practical prohibition of the payment of money for exchanges has also acted injuriously on officers and on the service in general. Men, rich and poor alike, were benefited by the system, as while the former were able to seek the climates best suited to their health, the latter profited largely in pocket. I myself, having had a severe fever in India, after the Mutiny campaign, was able to exchange to my present regiment by the payment of £650, and yet I have remained in the service, and I hardly know an instance where an officer has exchanged and has not continued soldiering for a reasonable time. It was only the other day that one of our very best subalterns sold out simply because he could not exchange. If he had been allowed to go to India, he could have lived upon the Indian pay; but he has now gone into a foreign service. He is a very great loss to the regiment."

Well, the House was told that there was no one to cross-examine in favour of Lord Cardwell's Warrant. This question was put to two witnesses—"What possible advantage could accrue to the State by allowing exchanges?" The answer of a Major of Carbineers was—

"There is a possibility of the State reaping advantage by allowing exchanges in this way."

State for War had thought it necessary to bring in this Bill. Speaking on the part of the War Department under the late Administration, he was glad to acknowledge that, judging from the Estimates laid upon the Table, and from the usual sources of information, they had no reason in the main to complain of the manner in which the right hon. Gentleman had carried on the policy of his Predecessor. The right hon. Gentleman had, he believed, impartially inquired into the many disputed and vexed questions involved in the recent changes with regard to the re-organization of the Army, and had satisfied himself of the wisdom of giving the policy of the late Government at least a fair and adequate trial. It was, therefore, in no carping or jealous spirit that he (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) had considered the Bill now before the House, and if it were nothing more than a reversal of something the late Government had done, he, for one, should not have been there to oppose it. The Act of 1871 and the abolition of Purchase generally touched such a variety of interests that it was difficult to foresee with precision how all those interests would be affected; and if it could be proved that any portion of the scheme worked injuriously to the Army, and if some remedy had been proposed which left the main principle of that measure unimpaired, and which would be followed by no evil results, he should have been only too happy to support the right hon. Gentleman. But, having considered the Bill, he came to the conclusion that it was entirely uncalled for, that it would work evil in the Army, and what was of greater importance still, that it would introduce for the first time, a most injurious and mischievous principle into the public service of the country. The reason he said the Bill had been uncalled for, was this—there had been a great mistake underlying the whole of the present debate, because it had been treated as if this was a Bill to introduce exchanges, whereas they did not require to be introduced, as they already existed. But the real question was, whether exchanges should take place for money payments. At present, if an officer was desirous of exchanging, he applied to the Military Secretary through his commanding officer, and if there was no disciplinary objection to the exchange, leave was given for it, the officer making a declaration on his honour that no money had passed either directly or indirectly, beyond the necessary expenses, a schedule of which had been delivered at the time of application, and the only thing which the Bill did was to do away with this declaration, and introduce the practice of one officer paying money to another officer. That he considered to be a vicious principle. It was, in effect, a Bill to introduce this system—to invest the occupants of certain offices under the Crown with the right, under the express sanction of Parliament, to traffic in those offices, and deliberately to invite them, on the one hand to avoid, on payment of money, the discharge of unpleasant duty which it had come to their turn to discharge, or, on the other hand, to make gain by undertaking something which the public service did not require them to undertake. He did not know which of these objects was the more objectionable. But not one tittle of evidence had been shown that the introduction of such a principle was necessary. The exchanges which existed were quite adequate for the public service. In a Return in the Appendix to the Report of the Royal Commission, there was shown the number of exchanges in the Army between 1861 and 1870, and in 1872 and 1873. He found that the number of exchanges which took place to and from regiments of the Line in the 10 years from 1861 to 1870 were 904, or an average of 90 each year, and a large proportion of those exchanges were intimately connected with the Purchase system—officers exchanging from one regiment to another in order to buy promotion cheaper or to obtain higher over-regulation prices. He believed it was a small computation to conclude that half of those exchanges were directly due to that cause, so that we were left with a residue of 45 exchanges per annum due to those reasonable causes connected with climate and personal convenience before the abolition of Purchase. It must be observed also that about the time of the abolition of Purchase something occurred which had greatly affected the question, because the troops which were before scattered all over the globe were concentrated in this country, and therefore the legitimate reason for exchanges on the ground of climate and personal convenience was greatly reduced, and yet, in the two years 1872 and 1873, he found that in the Infantry alone 99 exchanges had taken place, or 50 in each year, so that the number since was equal to the number that occurred before. Therefore, he called upon the Government to state some better ground than they had yet stated for the necessity of introducing this measure in the interest of the public service. But so far as the Royal Commissioners were concerned, they did not put it on that ground. They said that the prohibition of paying and receiving money for exchanges was "a serious hardship to some officers and a serious loss to others." It was quite true that they afterwards said the exchange itself was "an unmixed benefit to both, and certainly not detrimental to the service." He quite agreed with them. The late Government did not object to exchanges, and they had never done so, nor was it on these benches that were to be found the rigid devotees of the regimental system, and of strictly continuous service in one regiment throughout an officer's career:—what they did object to was, exchanging for money. That the Commissioners should have to come to the conclusion they did was not altogether surprising, if they acted entirely upon the evidence given before them. It was an inquiry into pecuniary grievances, and therefore it was quite natural that the witnesses should dwell upon the pecuniary aspect of the question. He would read some few extracts from the evidence of officers, but he must not be understood as blaming the officers themselves, for they had grown up under the system, and this was one of the incidents of that system for which they were not to blame. One officer complained that "no pecuniary advantage was now derived from exchanging;" another that he "was unable to obtain the money he would otherwise have obtained;" and another that an immense loss had been incurred by officers by the prohibition of money exchanges—that there used to be a "market price" of exchanges, and that "poor men were obliged to watch the market." He estimated his own power of exchanging as lieutenant-colonel at £800 to £1,000; and he contemplated a case in which an officer might effect an exchange in each rank up to lieutenant-colonel, receiving as lieutenant £300, as captain £500, as major £600, and as lieutenant-colonel £800, or £2,200 in all. He stated further that he himself received as captain £100 and his passage, "but then," he added, "I got Indian pay and immediately saved a lot of money." That was very much what would be the pecuniary effect of the existing rule. Then there was an instance of an officer in a Cavalry regiment who entered the service as a poor man. He got money for exchanging to India equal to the amount he paid for his commission as lieutenant. He complained that a vacancy as major occurred in his regiment which he could have purchased if he could have exchanged to India—he could have raised £2,500 by an exchange to India: and on being asked how he would have done it, he said, "I should have gone to Cox and Co., and said—Find me an exchange to India." Now, that evidence clearly pointed to the close relation between money exchanges and the purchase system. Indeed, the right hon. and gallant Member for Shropshire (Sir Percy Herbert), the cause of whose absence from that House they all deplored, and who acted as procureur général for the Purchase officers before the Royal Commission, expressly put the matter on this ground. He said—

"It was open to an officer previously to that regulation being passed, and previously to the passing of the Warrant, to receive a considerable sum for an exchange, and thereby if he was a poor man to obtain the means either of purchasing his promotion at a future time or of repaying money which he had borrowed in order to purchase his promotion."

From all this, he (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) maintained that there was an intimate connection between exchanges for money and the Purchase system—that the former were, in fact, an appanage and outcome of the latter. In the evidence given before Sir George Grey's Commission, an officer stated that the £2,000 he got for exchanging was precisely the difference between the selling value of his commission in England and its selling value in India. Money passing for exchanges might be a very good thing as long as they compelled officers to buy promotion, because they thereby furnished them with the means of recouping the money they had spent; but now that commissions were not bought there was no necessity for re-introducing the system of exchanging for money. A good deal had been said about the con-

another. I may also observe that no claim for money paid in connection with exchanges has been made to the Army Purchase Commissioners, or to anyone else, although the poorer officers complained that for the future they were to be debarred from receiving the advantages which a system of exchanges conferred. In conclusion, I must express the hope that this Bill will receive fair consideration. I utterly deny that there is any ground for those imaginary consequences which some hon. Gentlemen predict as the result of its passing into law. Their predictions are entirely contradicted by that which happened with regard to exchanges under the old system. I do not believe the evils which they so much apprehend will arise under the new. I submit this measure to the House with the utmost confidence that with the exercise of proper care on the part of the military authorities, it cannot do any of the harm which it has been said it will effect.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK said, a good deal had been said on this subject; but, in his opinion, a great deal more remained to be said. This Bill dealt with a most vital subject, and as there were points which had been as yet unREFERRED to, which he and others whose sentiments he spoke wished to urge, he should move the adjournment of the debate.

MR. DODDS seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Debate be now adjourned."
(Sir Henry Havelock.)

MR. DISRAELI: I regret that the hon. and gallant Gentleman has made this Motion. The Bill has been amply, and I will add ably, discussed; the debate has been sustained to-night by both sides with considerable ability; indeed, I may say that the question has been completely debated. With reference to the observation of the hon. and gallant Gentleman that there are arguments to be brought forward which have not yet been introduced to us, I am, I must say, somewhat sceptical as to that; but there are other stages of the Bill at which the right hon. Gentleman and his Friends will have every opportunity of bringing forward those arguments. I cannot at all agree with the proposition of the hon. and gallant Gentleman. It is to me one most unusual, considering the manner in which this debate has been carried on on one side of the House and the other, and how equally the two sides of the House have divided the time allotted to us. Besides, there is the fact that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War has been permitted to rise in reply, and it is not according to the custom or the courtesy of Parliament to pursue a debate after the reply. This should not have been permitted if there was an intention to pursue the discussion. I shall, therefore, feel it my duty to resist the Motion.

CAPTAIN NOLAN supported the Motion for adjournment, and hoped his hon. and gallant Friend would press it.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I question, Sir, if the right hon. Gentleman had any recollection of the debate on the Army Purchase Bill, or he would hardly have said that the proposal to adjourn this debate after one night's discussion was an unusual one. I also think it would not have been yielding too much if the right hon. Gentleman had complied with the request which has been made, and the proposal now before the House. There are, to my knowledge, several hon. Members, several hon. and gallant Members, who desire to address the House, and I know also that there are right hon. Friends of mine who wish to speak on this subject. I think it would have been altogether more convenient that a full and complete discussion should have taken place before we proceeded to divide on the second reading, than that we should take the course suggested by the right hon. Gentleman of postponing discussion until a further stage of the Bill. As, however, he has met that proposal by a denial, and as it is distinctly understood that the decision, whatever it may be, which the House may come to this evening will not be the final decision, but that it will be open to hon. Members on this side of the House to oppose the further stages of this measure, I should recommend my hon. and gallant Friend not to take a division upon an issue which may be confusing to some hon. Members, but to take the vote on the second reading, postponing further discussion and reserving full liberty to oppose the Bill at further stages. Sir, before I sit down I will further say that, intending as I do to oppose the second reading of this Bill, I cannot feel any regret that the discussion should terminate at the stage and in the manner in which it has terminated this evening. I cannot say that I am at all dissatisfied with the course the debate has taken, because I think—although it will not be in order for me to discuss the subject upon a question of adjournment—I think I may say that we have not heard from the Government yet, during the whole of this evening, what are the real reasons which have induced them to introduce this measure, neither have we heard from them any answer at all, nothing which professes to be an answer to the grave objections raised against the measure by hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House. The arguments of the Government have been rather palliations of the measure than attempts to defend it. My hon. Friend the Member for the Border Burghs, the hon. and gallant Member for Longford, and the right hon. Member for the University of London, have argued against the Bill upon higher grounds than any which have been urged by right hon. Gentlemen opposite. They have shown grave reasons, in my opinion, against the paying for exchanges at all; while, at best, the system will allow of officers by pecuniary means regulating the terms of their service, they have shown that it may establish vested pecuniary interests on the part of officers which the authorities at the War Office and the Horse Guards may find it extremely difficult to deal with, and they have shown that it is probable, and more, they have shown that it is likely, to open the way to some of the worst evils which the abolition of Purchase swept away. Now, Sir, I cannot admit that the arguments which have been used by hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House have been met on these grounds by hon. Members opposite. Feeling as I do that the more the subject is discussed the stronger will be the feeling of the Ministry against the proposal, and with the hope that some impression may be made even upon the minds of hon. Gentlemen opposite on calm consideration of the arguments used in this debate, I am not by any means dissatisfied that the debate should close where it does. Therefore, if the hon. and gallant Member takes my advice, he will not proceed in his Motion for adjournment, but will take another opportunity of opposing this Bill.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK said, that after what had fallen from the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition, and knowing that opportunities hereafter would not be wanting for further discussion, he would not press his Motion, but would give Notice of his intention of proposing an Amendment on the Motion for going into Committee.

Main Question put.

BILL—[BILL 70.]

(Mr. William Henry Smith, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. W. H. SMITH, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that it was found necessary to make certain alterations in the Registry of Deeds Office last year, and the object of the present Bill was to repeal a provision which required that any alteration in the remuneration of the officers of that office should not take effect until after the end of the Session of Parliament in which such alteration was made.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday.

EAST INDIA HOME GOVERNMENT [PENSIONS] BILL.

Resolution [February 15] reported and agreed to:—Bill ordered to be brought in by Lord GEORGE HAMILTON and Mr. WILLIAM HENRY SMITH.

BUILDING SOCIETIES ACT (1874) AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Sir HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON, Bill to repeal section eight of "The Building Societies Act, 1874," and make other provision in lieu thereof, ordered to be brought in by Sir HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON and Mr. Secretary CROSS.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 72.]

EAST INDIA (COMPENSATION OF OFFICERS).

Ordered, That all Papers and Documents presented to Parliament upon the subject of Grievances of Indian Officers since Session 1861 be referred to the Select Committee.—(Lord George Hamilton.)

POLICE MAGISTRATES [SALARIES].

Committee to consider of authorising the payment, out of the Consolidated Fund, of increased Salaries to the Magistrates of the Police Courts in the Metropolis (Queen's Recommendation signified), this day.

any inhabitant of his diocese who might wish to consult him, whether for spiritual counsel or any other matter suitable to his high office. Well, then, if I may now assume the need of more help for the work of the Episcopate, I presume I am bound to advert to what is sometimes alleged in qualification of this need, the appliances and improvements of modern discovery — railways, telegraphs, the penny post, and, I suppose, even post-cards. Now, I do not wish to use too strong language on any part of the case; but I must need say that this argument is beneath notice. Is it not obvious that all these things make far more work than they save? What good does it do me that I can go 100 miles much quicker than formerly if I am called on to go the 100 miles twenty times oftener than I used to be? If I get forty letters in a day to answer, is it much advantage that I have half-a-dozen posts by which to reply, and self-sealing envelopes to do it with, if I am no better able than before to decide the questions brought before me, and which used to come in much smaller numbers? Another objection to the Bill is of a different kind. Admitting that in many cases more Bishops may be wanted, it is said that the matter is so important that Parliament ought to judge of each separate case as it arises. This opinion may no doubt be fairly held, and, indeed, I do not well know how to argue against it. It is, of course, saying that nothing shall be done, for in all matters Parliament is able at any time to interfere if it pleases. I can only give the general answer which I have already done, that I conceive the whole of our Church system, not omitting the highest part of it, may properly be made capable of self-development. But one special point may be suggested. The object, by common consent, is to be attained by voluntary effort; the endowments are to be provided or promised before the arrangements are made. But we cannot expect any one to do so for a given new See if the Act constituting that See has to pass through the ordeal of a separate transit through Parliament. The only new Sees have been those of Ripon and Manchester, and they were not provided by voluntary contributions. But it would be very different if Parliament had once, by a general measure, given its sanction to the principle, and recognized the probability that such Sees may be called for, and the parties would only have to deal with such bodies as the Ecclesiastical Commissioners and the Privy Council, acting under the guidance of a statute. In the next place, the necessity for the Bill is questioned, because of the substitutes for additional Bishops, upon which so much light has been thrown by our proceedings of late years. Those substitutes are two, but they may both be described by the term Suffragans, or quasi-Suffragans. Episcopal duties are performed either by Suffragan Bishops properly so-called, appointed under the Act of Henry VIII., or by retired Colonial Bishops acting under licence. I desire to speak with satisfaction of both these experiments. The latter is no doubt a curious and unexpected result of the immense development of the Colonial Church. No doubt it was hardly supposed that we should see what we do; considerable numbers of Bishops who have worked in the prime of life in the tropics for 16 or 20 years—as long a time as most men's health will bear—and, when unable to continue there, returning home, and still able to work in their natural climate for many years as dignitaries, and even as parochial ministers. It is not, however, every one who can have the good fortune of the right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of Lichfield), who on returning home and undertaking an English diocese, was able to bring back with him, or to attract to him, his two most intimate friends, who had worked with him at home and abroad nearly through his whole clerical career, and to establish them as his coadjutors in his Episcopate, no doubt greatly to his comfort and advantage. The revival of the Suffragan Act, too, had been a great advantage—that revival, in spite of the sneers and prophecies of failure which attended it. It might remind us of similar imagined difficulties as to two other measures of late years—the one the revival of Convocation, which was said by no less an authority than Sir Francis Palgrave to be impossible. The other was the possession of self-government by the Colonial Churches, which was fruitlessly attempted to be conferred upon them through Imperial legislation, promoted by many eminent men, such as Mr. Gladstone and Lord Westbury. In both these cases the difficulty disappeared—

according to the old saying, solvitur ambulando. Convocation did revive; and the Colonies, finding the difficulties at home insuperable, simply took the matter into their own hands and did it. And so it has been with the Suffragan Act. But as to the present question, the answer in both cases is the same. Suffragans are good, and may at any time be introduced; but they are no equivalents for Diocesan Bishops. They cannot relieve the ancient Bishop to the full, as they act under his control; and invariably the clergy are found to prefer that their own proper Bishop shall come among them. The Bishop of Lincoln, who has an excellent suffragan, Bishop Mackenzie, writes to me to this effect. He says—

“My dear Lord,—It is a very great disappointment indeed to me to be unable to come up and vote for the second reading of your Episcopate Bill, having an engagement for a church opening near Grantham, but I earnestly hope and believe that there is no doubt of its success. I should like to have been able to state that the system of Bishops Suffragan, which was first conceded on my petition for this diocese, though very valuable in some respects (especially for increase of confirmations), is no adequate substitute for, what you propose, the subdivision of dioceses. Perhaps you will have the kindness, if you think fit, to say this is the result of my experience of it for five years.

“Yours, my dear Lord, very faithfully,

“C. LINCOLN.”

And now I think I have said enough on the general case, and must advert a little to the history of the question since it was last before this House. There are three grounds in that history, which seemed to warrant the re-introduction of the Bill. After it had failed the last time, the Association which exists for this object thought it would be well to attempt to procure support to the measure from below—from the parochial clergy. We did so by inquiring into their individual opinions by means of queries addressed to the Rural Deans. Some few of the right rev. Prelates found fault with us for presuming to address their servants the Rural Deans otherwise than through themselves. I cannot, however, regret having done so. The object was to obtain the independent opinions of the clergy; and it would have been said that we were bringing influence to bear upon them if we had consulted them through their superiors, the Bishops or Archdeacons. The result of this inquiry was remarkable. There are 740 rural deaneries in England and Wales. Of these, 477 have sent replies, and it may, perhaps, be assumed that those who have not replied, if not clearly in favour of the Bill, are not actually opposed to it; and of those, 468 were decidedly, for the most part unanimously, in favour of the principle of the Bill. The fact is remarkable, as exposing the vulgar notion—sometimes, I believe, entertained even by men calling themselves High Churchmen—that the clergy are jealous of their Bishops, and desire to see little of them. The next fact was, the formal assent to the Bill of the Upper House of Convocation, which we had not had before, though many Bishops had individually favoured it. The subject was referred by that House to a Committee, which reported in 1873, and on that Report was founded a Resolution of that House itself, which recommended a measure with which the present Bill is in entire accordance. The Resolution was as follows:—

“That we concur in the recommendation of the Cathedral Commissioners of 1852, that a general Enabling Act of the Legislature should be obtained, empowering the Queen in Council, through a scheme to be proposed by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, with the consent of the Bishop, to form a new See by the division of any existing diocese; the scheme for carrying this into effect in each case being laid on the Table of both Houses of Parliament for a certain period, and, if no Address against the same be carried in either House of Parliament, to become law.”

The Resolution, however, was general, and did not commit those who passed it to immediate and practical approval of such a Bill. Our next step, therefore, was, under the advice of the most rev. Primate, to address each Bishop separately—knowing as we do how rarely they are able to meet in full numbers. I have here the written replies of every single Prelate, including, indeed, the bearer of an illustrious name who is still living, but whose functions in this life, it must be feared, are over—Bishop Thirlwall. And the opinions of the Bishops, with only two exceptions, are expressly favourable to the introduction of the Bill; indeed, the writers promise their support—that is, to the second reading—beyond which, of course, we can expect no one to go. And on this I will only presume to express a hope that that support will be a hearty support. I have had, on former occasions, support from certain right rev. Prelates—whether living still or not I do not say—support to which the wettest of wet blankets, the most damning of faint praise, is no unfit language to apply. I have every reason to hope for better things now. The Bishops, however, made it a very reasonable condition that the political prospects of the measure were such as to make its passing in the Session when it was introduced fairly certain. And this points to the third material circumstance to which I referred—the political changes since the Bill was last here. At that time, and when afterwards I consulted the Bishops, the Liberal Party were in power; and to fulfil the condition mentioned, it would have been requisite to obtain the consent in both Houses of the Leaders of Opposition as well as of Ministers. Now, with a strong Conservative Government, with an adequate majority in both Houses, the case is different. I do not, indeed, consider that the Liberals are at all bound to regard the Bill with less favour than the Conservatives; but still, it is a measure which must naturally, I hope, be regarded by Conservatives as one which they specially should support, and if it does not pass now I cannot imagine how it ever should. I have to thank Her Majesty's Government for the great forwardness with which, through the Prime Minister, their consent has been promised to me. I have now only to advert to some of the more material details of the Bill; and here I cannot but say, if I may be excused a bit of conceit, that if every one was as reasonable about these details as I think I am myself, I should have little fear as to the fate of the Bill. To my mind a Bishop is a Bishop; and if I can secure a due number of independent Bishops, in the full spiritual and ecclesiastical sense, for the Church, I am content to leave all details to the wisdom of Parliament and of Government to settle. Well, the first point is as to the provision of funds. I have proposed that they shall be entirely found by voluntary subscription, and in particular that the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commission shall not be touched. In itself, I think this most unreasonable. I do not go on any technical ground about the Episcopal Fund: I am content to take the very ground of those who hold that the funds of that Commission ought to go solely to the relief of spiritual destitution. I hold that it is a narrow and dim-sighted view of the subject to call it such relief when you put down a poor man, with £150 and £200 a-year, to do the best he can, single-handed, in a destitute district, and that it is not so when you found a new See. Experience both at home and in the Colonies has abundantly proved that one of the very best means of promoting the very objects commonly reckoned among the remedies to that destitution, is the provision of a due number of Bishops. But I have got to pass the Bill; and I know well enough the power of the noble Earl (the Earl of Shaftesbury), and of his enormous following, to be assured that I cannot pass it other than it is in this respect. Nor do I mean that it ought to cause any difficulty. I appeal to the immense wealth of this country, and of its Churchmen, who are still the chief and the wealthiest in it; and I say that if they do not care enough for this object to be ready to pay for it—as Lord Palmerston said, “They may have a Bishop if they will pay for him”—they may go without. In this country resources to any amount are at hand for any secular object of amusement, of use, of luxury, of ornament—and surely there will be the same for such a purpose as this Bill deals with. At Manchester, quite lately, it has been proposed, without parade and without appealing to any one outside the town itself, to raise £250,000 to purchase the best site in the whole town, and another £250,000 to build there a great cathedral; and no doubt they will do it if they choose. This Bill, too, will partly work through mixed motives. There are large towns and accumulated populations in the country which see their neighbours with the advantage of an Episcopal See, and who will say, Why should not we have it as well as they? Nor need the endowment be all in money; land may be given and advowsons, as was once actually offered in Cornwall. Then I have been asked what Sees I look to founding? a question involving misapprehension of the Bill. I reply that I do not know: it is for the local parties who feel the need of a Bishop to find funds which may be thought sufficient by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, with whom it will rest to decide theme should proceed. I hope that they will judge according to a standard right on a relative comparison with another. The may, perhaps, be the country. But if the cannot or will not raise, and the people of a second See, it would orfolk—assuming that if a proper case—to say have it because Corn it first, or as well. It has to deprive Chichester of its See, because Southwell may want a an they do. So about ve that to the proper either desire to diminish y existing See, nor do anything like a rigid is respect. Let it be rding to the circum- case. The next point which I the most fear ion. I mean the ques- Parliament. I certainly d strongly press what I the simple extension of tem of rotation. And generally, I have not been able to attend to the many suggestions I have received, that I should engraft on the Bill various supposed amendments in our present system, such as some limitation on the free choice of the Crown in the appointment of Bishops. My belief is, that while the Church is established the appointment of all its Bishops ought to be in the Crown, as even that of Deans has been made by recent legislation. The following words are the concluding ones, and with them I also conclude, of an eloquent article in a Review now 31 years ago—

"The time is not far off when the tumult and triumph of our barbaric wars, and the renown of fine diplomacy, and the praise of financial skill, and the names of those who have achieved and advanced these exploits and successes of earth, shall weigh light in the hearts of the fathers and mothers of England against the names of those who shall first gain for the millions of our 'poor destitute' the long-delayed boon of one additional Bishopric."

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
—(Lord Lyttelton.)

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY: Perhaps your Lordships will allow me to make two or three observations. It is not my intention to oppose the Bill either on the second reading or in any of its details—though I am far from thinking it necessary or even desirable. I must plead guilty to holding still some narrow and bigoted opinions ascribed to me by my noble Friend. I still hold that the common fund must be used for the provision of the living agent and the full completion of the parochial system. The main objection I always urged against measures of this description has been taken away by the insertion of the 10th clause, which provides that—

"Nothing in this Act shall authorize the Commissioners to apply any portion of their common fund towards the endowment and maintenance of any Bishop, Dean and Chapter, Chapter, or other office erected or created under the provisions of this Act."

That the Church Establishment is in some danger, and that it requires a good deal of succour, no one will deny; and, indeed, the noble Lord is to be thanked for the effort he is conscientiously making on its behalf. But one may fairly question whether this plan is in any degree adequate, or whether, in fact, it is in the right direction. I doubt whether the extension of the Episcopal order, with all its train of Deans and Chapters, Diocesan Courts, Registrars, Apparitors, and the like, all of which appear under the 6th clause, will give much assurance to the country. I cannot but believe that the existence of the Establishment may yet be prolonged for many years; but it must be by reforms far more wide, deep, and searching than the one here before us. Its great, and, indeed, sole purpose is the "increase of the Episcopate;" but, my Lords, the multiplication of Bishops is one thing, the multiplication of Prelates is another. I think I might venture to state that the answer of the country to an appeal for the first would be favourable; but I do not pretend to say what will be the reply to the second. But I have no opposition to offer either now or in Committee, so I shall not trouble your Lordships with any further remarks.

THE BISHOP OF WINCHESTER said, he would venture, on the strength of his experience in several dioceses, to address a few words to their Lordships on this subject. While working for many years in the Diocese of Exeter, where there were two distinct populations occupying different counties, he could not help remarking the need there was for the division of the See into two distinct dioceses. Its area was far too large to be adequately dealt with by a single Bishop. As matters now stood the Bishop was 100 miles removed from the further parts of Cornwall, and consequently the people saw far less of him than was desirable; the Bishop was overworked, and in some instances the spiritual interests of the people were looked after only at the risk of great sacrifices. He afterwards presided for 10 years over the Diocese of Ely, which consisted of four counties, and there, again, he thought that another Bishop was very much needed;—the diocese compared with others was a small one, and yet it had taxed all his powers. But after going to the far larger Diocese of Winchester, he began to think he must have been unreasonable in wishing for help when in Ely. He then found out what a really large See was. Winchester included besides South London, where there was a working-class population of about 1,000,000, the suburban and rural parts of Surrey, the whole of Hampshire, the Isle of Wight, and the Channel Islands almost on the Coast of France; the area of its surface was so immense that it was almost physically impossible to visit all its details: and within the present generation the population of the diocese had increased almost threefold. If 50 years ago there was ample work in it for a Bishop, what must be the case now? The noble Lord who had introduced the Bill—and whom he thanked most heartily for having done it—had referred to Suffragans as a means of lessening the Bishops' labours. His (the Bishop of Winchester's) experience was that a Suffragan did not in the slightest degree lessen those labours. He ventured to say that he worked as hard now as he would have to do without a Suffragan. No doubt, by having such an assistant there was more work done, but the labour of the Bishop was not thereby lessened. Moreover, as a rule, people did not care for Suffragans. What the people wanted was their own Bishop, and when they were asked whether they would wait a little, or have the services of the Suffragan, they always said they preferred to wait. This was the case in Winchester, although the Suffragan of that diocese was chosen as one who was peculiarly beloved by the population. He knew it to be a common cause of complaint among the people that the occasions were so rare when they had their Bishop among them. He thought that in providing for an increase in the Episcopate care would be taken that it should be suited to the wants of the several dioceses, and that there should be no new See instituted merely because there happened to be a fine church in the district. Under the circumstances, it would be a great boon to the country to have an increase of the Episcopate such as the present Bill proposed. He hoped that their Lordships would read the Bill a second time, and make such alterations in it in Committee as they deemed to be necessary.

THE BISHOP OF EXETER remarked that the diocese over which he presided was particularly interested in the subject-matter of this Bill, inasmuch as it required sub-division more than any other, it was the largest in area and containing the largest number of clergy;

while from its unwieldy shape it was impossible for the most active Bishop properly to discharge its work. It was longer than the distance from London to Bristol. In consequence of its extreme length and from the fact of the Cathedral city being situated at one of its extremities, he had often to travel for some eight or nine hours to his work and as long home again after he had done it. In addition to that inconvenience, there was a very heavy amount of correspondence with the clergy, and this work increased faster than the facilities for communication did. Men were much more active at the present day than they used to be, and it would not be borne for the Church to be as slack as it was 17 or 18 years ago, and there was much more doing in county parishes which no one would have thought of a short time ago. He had sometimes heard it said that it was not a good thing that the Bishop should be perpetually interfering with his clergy; but in reply to that statement he must remind the House that it was from the clergy themselves that this demand for an increase of the Episcopate emanated. They felt the want of advice and support. The chief argument in favour of this measure was that it was at present impossible, owing to the pressure of work, for the Bishops to discharge their duties properly. In support of that allegation, he might say that during the first year after his appointment to the Diocese of Exeter he was at work every day from an early hour in the morning until a late hour at night; so much so, that when the late Government asked him to allow his name to be put upon a Commission of some importance, he was obliged to refuse on the ground that until the end of the year he had only 11 days at his disposal; and afterwards even those days were filled up. Although the pressure of work was not quite so heavy at the present time as it was formerly, it was as much as he could do to get not quite six weeks in the year for rest. The consequence of this great pressure of work was, that when the clergy came to the Bishop for his advice he was compelled to give them a hasty opinion on the spur of the moment, not having time to weigh and consider his reply. But there was a still stronger argument in favour of a division of his diocese, which was that from its extent he was unable to go to his clergy and his clergy were unable to come to him. It was quite as important that the clergy should be able to get at their Bishop as that the Bishop should be able to get at them. Whenever any of his clergy required his advice on any difficult or troublesome question, the responsibility with regard to which they were anxious not to take upon their own shoulders, they had frequently to travel 100 miles in order to see him personally. This was a very heavy tax upon their purse and their time, and the clergy felt it would be a great help to them if they could consult the Bishop upon easier terms. Beyond this, it must be remembered that a great deal of the diocesan work had to be done through united action, and it was important that the clergy should have ready means of meeting for that purpose. Thus, when the Elementary Education Act was passed, and the Government ceased to examine in religious instruction in elementary schools, a general feeling prevailed that it was the duty of the clergy to take up the work which the Government had dropped, and it was resolved to raise funds for the appointment of diocesan inspectors of religious instruction, and a committee of the clergy was appointed to control those inspectors; but it was found almost impossible for it to work on account of the extent of the diocese. If he named Exeter as the place of meeting for the committee, the clergymen of Cornwall were unable to attend; and if he named Truro, the Devon clergymen could not come; while, if he selected some middle place like Plymouth, he lost half the clergymen from each county. It was under these circumstances that a perpetual demand had arisen on the part of the clergy for the division of the diocese, in order that their work might not be hindered and that it might be better done. The noble Lord (Lord Lyttelton), in framing this measure, had taken the inevitable course in providing that the money necessary for carrying out its object should be raised by voluntary subscriptions; but he confessed that this would operate very hardly upon very poor dioceses like that of Exeter, in which it would be very difficult to raise the necessary funds, and therefore he hoped that it might not be found impossible to admit of certain modifications in the proposition of the noble

The Bishop of Exeter

Lord which would go some way towards meeting the difficulty he had indicated, without interfering with the general principle of the Bill. For instance, in cases where the income of the diocese to be divided was in excess of £4,200 a-year—the minimum sum that Bishops were to receive—the surplus might be appropriated towards the income of the new diocese to be carved out of it. The present total income of his own Diocese was £5,000, and as it was reduced to £4,200 there was £800 a-year to provide for the new Bishop. It would also be reasonable that a canonry in the cathedral of the original diocese should be assigned to the new diocese, or one large living in the gift of the Crown or of the Bishop. As regarded the voluntary principle itself as applied to this subject, he thought that it was a mistake, being satisfied that from the demands made by the clergy for the increase of the Episcopate they felt that they should be better able to perform their duties if the number of Bishops were increased, and that it would be for the sake of the efficiency of their work that new Sees should be created and properly endowed.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY: My Lords, the noble Lord (Lord Lyttelton) has brought before us a very important practical question, and I should not be doing my duty if I did not, in fulfilment of the pledge I have given to him, express my hearty concurrence in the measure which he has brought forward. I am quite aware that, as the noble Earl (the Earl of Shaftesbury) has said, this is but a small reform among the many which we desire to see effected in the Church of England; but I believe that the best way of promoting real practical reforms is by taking, one by one, such reforms as may be proposed to us; and, for my part, I think that this is a very important practical reform. The noble Lord referred to the manner in which members of the Episcopal Bench had dealt with his former efforts in this direction; but I may be allowed to say, on their behalf, that when the noble Lord made his previous efforts there did appear to be something unpractical in his proposed legislation. That, I believe, cannot be said on the present occasion, as many of the matters which raised discussion, and were likely to shipwreck the former efforts of the noble Lord, are now removed. The question of appealing to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, for instance, to give any portion of their common fund for the purpose in view is now out of the way, and not likely to be introduced into the debate which may occur when this Bill goes—as I hope it may—into Committee. Again, I cannot help observing what is going on around me, and the symptoms which show that there is a feeling in the community now, such as there was not then, that some effort of this kind ought to be made. It is impossible even to read the newspapers without seeing that in the large towns efforts for the extension of the Episcopate are now being made which were not made on previous occasions. I cannot doubt that your Lordships, both when this matter was previously before you and now also, were convinced of the necessity of carrying some such measure if it should be practicable. When I came to the See of London, I was called upon to consecrate what I was told within a few days of my own consecration was the 200th church built since the beginning of Bishop Blomfield's episcopate—and 200 churches are of themselves a diocese; and thus far it is clear that the efforts of Bishop Blomfield had created what was equivalent to a new diocese in the Diocese of London. My esteemed predecessor in the See of Canterbury was, as your Lordships are aware, engaged for 20 years in laboriously building up the See of Ripon, and everyone who is acquainted with the North of England knows how his labours have been crowned with success, and what a great cause of satisfaction it was to those who were interested in the spiritual welfare of that part of the country that the See which he was the means of thus building up had been called into existence. Your Lordships are, perhaps, also aware that his immediate predecessor while Bishop of Chester, with that mild wisdom for which he was remarkable, by his unhasting, but unrelenting zeal, during the 20 years he presided over the Diocese of Chester, consecrated one church for each month of his episcopate, constituting by those 240 churches what was equivalent to a new Diocese. And the Diocese of Chester, during the time when he first laboured in it, contained what is now the new Diocese of Manchester, and a part of the present Diocese of Carlisle.

ample, may leave little time for literary labour. In the past times it has been the glory of the Episcopate of England that the Bishops had time to think and write, as well as to work. In an age like this, when dangers are supposed to threaten the whole social system—not of this country alone, but of all Europe—and when there is a danger of materialism spreading throughout the civilized world, I am reminded that if we are enabled to resist those dangers, it will be through the works of that great Bishop and Prelate of the Church of England, who wrote the immortal “Analogy.” That author raised a standard against materialism, which I believe to be as useful in this day as it was in that in which he lived. I trust we may not come to a time when we are to have no learned Bishops. I do, indeed, myself know a learned divine—a friend of my own—who was obliged to refuse the post of a Bishop because he felt that if he accepted it he must desist from those literary and theological labours which I believe will make his name famous; but we have not come to that pass yet. There is one great man who is still living among us, although he has ceased to fill the office of a Diocesan Bishop. I believe that the name of Bishop Thirlwall stands forth to show that the existence of a great learned Bishop is still possible in the 19th century, and I doubt whether the Church of England—I doubt whether the Church Universal—ever produced a man more learned or more able than that distinguished man, who I rejoice to say is still living. I trust that your Lordships will give a second reading to this Bill.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday the 9th of March next.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, he desired to say a few words, as some misconception had arisen as to what was intended in reference to the Bill. In introducing this measure he stated that he proposed to repeal the Schedule to the Judicature Act of 1873, which contained the Rules as to the practice of the Court, and that he proposed to incorporate the contents of that Schedule along with the Rules made by the Judges last year, and submitted to Her Majesty in Council. As misconceptions had arisen, he wished to state that the Schedule of the Act of 1873 contained about 60 Rules, which were called the leading Rules of Practice and Procedure under the Act. It was, in addition, left to the Judges to prepare Rules in greater detail, because the 60 Rules were inadequate to meet the whole practice and procedure of the Court. The Judges, consequently, last year approved a very extensive body of supplementary Rules under the Act. The only object he had in view was that the body of the Profession should not be obliged to resort to two different compilations of Rules for the purpose of ascertaining the procedure of the Act. To him it was a matter of complete indifference. He held in his hand a complete body of Rules—the 60 Rules in the Schedule of the Act of 1873, and those approved by the Judges last summer. That document ran to the extent of 117 long pages, and his apprehension was lest the Statute Book should be needlessly loaded with so great a body of matter, which might be changed by the Courts after the Act came into operation. If changes were made by the Judges, these Rules, although published in the Schedule, would become useless. He doubted whether it was wise to load the Statute Book with such a body of matter; but it was indifferent to him whether it was placed in the Schedule or treated as a separate body of Rules. There could be nothing further from his mind than to suppose that such a body of Rules ought not to be brought under the notice of Parliament and the public in sufficient time before the Act came into operation.

Moved, “That the Bill be now read 2^a.”
—(The Lord Chancellor.)

THE EARL OF HARROWBY said, he did not wish to raise an obstacle at the present stage of the Bill, but there was one point in connection with the Bill to which their Lordships’ attention should be called. A strong feeling existed in favour of the continuance of the juris-

For what would a suitor think, who had been successful in the first half of the Court, and then had that decision reversed by the second half? What reason would he have for believing that the second decision was more worthy of confidence than the first? Further, the upper half was not to be a permanent Court of Appeal, which, recruited from Judges from Scotland and Ireland, might become conversant with the laws of those countries: but, at the end of three years, the Judges of the upper half were liable to be sent down to the lower half; and this in itself seemed to be a most unconstitutional proceeding by placing it in the power of the Crown to remove, or rather degrade, a Judge, for no wrong done. If these difficulties were unseparable from the constitution of the new Court, it was all the more incumbent on them to consider whether the old tribunal was not, on the whole, a more satisfactory Court of Appeal.

LORD HATHERLEY said, he would have inferred from the last speech that the noble and learned Lord (Lord Penzance) intended to propose the repeal of the Act and to oppose the second reading of this Bill. As to the resignation of their Lordships' jurisdiction, he should reserve any remarks he had to make until he saw the plan it was proposed to substitute for the new Court of Appeal. He did not admit that the question of a second appeal had any material bearing upon the subject. Before the Act was passed there was a Committee of this House which considered every alternative; and the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack proposed a scheme which would have saved their Lordships' jurisdiction if anything could have saved it. He believed the Act was founded on sound principles, and was calculated to uphold the dignity of the House.

LORD REDESDALE said, it was not an open question whether they were going to reverse the policy of the Act, because the Bill did that for England by giving a second appeal; and, that being granted, the question again arose whether their Lordships' House was not the best Court for the purpose in view. It was admitted last year by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack that the new Court would not have the prestige of their Lordships' House. There never had been the least complaint from England against that House as a Court of Appeal, and the feeling which had been expressed in Scotland and Ireland was well known. Therefore, those who had brought causes to it were satisfied with it and desired its jurisdiction to be preserved; and he believed that the preponderance of opinion among the members of the Bench and the Bar was in favour of maintaining it.

LORD WAVENEY said, that in conversation with a high judicial authority in Scotland (the late Lord Murray), he had expressed implicit confidence in the House of Lords as a Court of Appeal in Scotch cases, even though the Law Lords did not include any Scotch Judges, because he said the decisions were submitted to men conversant with the highest principles of jurisprudence. He thought this was strong evidence of the satisfaction of the Profession in Scotland. He had been at some pains to satisfy himself on a recent visit to Ireland that the Profession there was content with their Lordships' House. He could not help thinking there was a defect in the Act or in the Bill in the absence of a declaratory clause with regard to the effect the change would have on our general jurisprudence and the hearing of appeals from all parts of the Empire. There ought to be no doubt whatever as to what the jurisdiction of the House was to be in the future. Let it be supposed that a case which was now exciting great attention in the Peninsula of India should in any circumstances follow the course of a great cause in the last century—it would be a great disadvantage to the Colonies if it were thought that the power of ultimate appeal to that House had passed away from their Lordships.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he hoped it would not be thought that he undervalued the arguments which had been adduced by his noble Friends if he did not now refer to them at length. Understanding that the whole question would be raised on a future occasion, he hoped that his noble Friend at the Table (Lord Redesdale) would adopt the suggestion which had been thrown out by his noble and learned Friend (Lord Selborne), and be prepared when the Bill went into Committee to explain the scheme he would substitute for the Act of 1873. He would fix the Committee for that day week, or if his noble Friend preferred Thursday in that week, which was also an open day, he would say Thursday; but having regard to the state of Business in their Lordships' House, he did not think it would be convenient to postpone the Committee beyond Thursday week.

LORD REDESDALE hoped a little more time would be allowed. There was nothing in the state of the Business either of that or the other House of Parliament which required so much haste, and he did think it most important that an opportunity should be given for a further expression of opinion by those best qualified to pronounce it upon this subject. The other House of Parliament were fully engaged with a variety of measures, and if this Bill were sent down to them they could not take cognizance of it for a considerable time to come. The matter was really of so much importance that he hoped their Lordships would induce the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack to allow some further time for the Committee.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he would only make one observation. He hoped whatever time was allowed before the Committee would enable the noble Lord at the Table (Lord Redesdale) to adopt the very reasonable request of his noble and learned Friend — namely, that he should give the House the advantage of having the alternative scheme before them.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND must remind the noble Lord at the Table that this was not the first time this subject had been discussed. No subject had been more thoroughly considered and discussed during the last two or three Sessions. The noble Lord wished further time in order to get up more opposition to the scheme; but, as he stated on the first night of the Session, it was the intention of the Government, if possible, to pass this Bill, and he did not think it was too much to ask their Lordships to go into Committee on Thursday week. He could not believe that the noble Lord was not prepared with some substitute for the Act of 1873, unless he really meant to turn matters into utter chaos. He should certainly endeavour to persuade their Lordships to go into Committee on Thursday week.

LORD REDESDALE observed that if nothing were done beyond retaining their Lordships' jurisdiction there would be nothing of chaos whatever. There was no embarrassment in their appellate business, and the country was perfectly satisfied with the manner in which it was conducted.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday the 4th of March next.

SECOND READING. (NO. 11.)

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."—(The Lord Chancellor.)

LORD SELBORNE said, that in some important respects this Bill differed from that of last year. The Bill which he had the honour of introducing in 1873 was greatly improved in the last Session, partly by his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack, but principally by the revision of Vice Chancellor Hall. The present Bill had also, he cheerfully acknowledged, undergone, in some respects, further improvement — more, however, in matters of form than of substance. But, having said this, he must accompany it with some material qualifications. He was not going into details now, which were more fit to be considered in Committee; it occurred to him, however, that the Bill in some respects left things obscure which were clear in the former measure. It did not, he thought with sufficient clearness, define the nature of the legal title which he presumed it was the intention to give to every registered owner as against all subsequent unregistered titles. The former Bill was better expressed in this respect, which said that all unregistered interests should be deemed equitable and not legal interests, the legal estate, with a power of sale, being in all cases in the registered owner. These, though important, were questions of expression, which, if at present defective, could easily be, and would, no doubt, be set right. But on two other points his noble and learned Friend had intentionally made changes, in the wisdom of which he could not agree. In the former Bill there was a provision which said that after a certain period upon all transactions of sale involving the fee simple of land, registration should be compulsory. His noble and learned Friend, for reasons which he had stated to the House, had thought it right to omit altogether that compulsory clause. And further, in the 21st clause of the Bill his noble and learned Friend had introduced a provision which would enable the proprietor at any time after registration to withdraw the title from the registry and to put the land back under the old system. These changes were entirely opposed to the whole policy of the measure, and gravely compromised its promise of large and general utility. After fully considering these changes and the reasons which his noble and learned Friend had given for them, he must say that he regarded them with the greatest apprehension and the greatest disappointment. There was an essential difference between a measure which merely added one more to the methods of conveyancing of which men now had the choice, and one which made registration compulsory and irrevocable. The two systems were wide as the poles asunder. That which made registration compulsory and irrevocable was the proper instrument and machinery for introducing a general reconstruction and reform, gradual and progressive, into the whole system of land titles and land transfers. He ventured to say it could not be done without. Until you arrived at the point of compulsion, and at the same time made registration irrevocable, you would not lay anything like a sure and substantial foundation for the abolition of the embarrassing and obstructive system of deduction of title and conveyancing. Another incidental advantage of an effective and general, over an ineffective and partial, change, was this—that it would enable us to get rid of some of those delusions and misconceptions as to what was called “the land question”—the present condition of landed property, and its relations to other property—delusions and misconceptions which grew out of the present difficulty of dealing with property in land. He admitted the system to which he referred could be introduced only gradually and progressively. But if you required registration upon every sale of land in fee simple after two or three years, you would get a new start from that time forward; in the case of that property you would get rid of conveyancing altogether in all future transfers, and in the course of 30 or 40 years the title would be clear. That system would be attended with yearly increasing advantages, and after the lapse of one generation would completely substitute a simple and sound system for one which on all hands was admitted to be complex, unsatisfactory, and productive of public inconvenience. His noble and learned Friend had alleged three reasons for making the change which he had introduced—first, that the proposal as to compulsion was not in itself universally applicable, being limited to cases of sale; secondly, that it would be scarcely possible to apply it to very small transactions; and lastly, that it would render necessary the appointment of district Registrars throughout the country, and that there would be great difficulty in procuring the necessary funds for the support of so expensive and large a scale of establishments. Well, he had considered all these points, and the result of his consideration was, that he believed they were only some of those “lions” which always got into the path when we wanted to disturb an existing system, and that we had only to face them boldly and they would disappear. As to the objection that the proposal would leave untouched a great part of the land of the Kingdom, he did not think it very forcible. If you touched all the land that was put up for sale, you would deal with a great portion of the land of the Kingdom, and with all that part which, in the natural course of things, became marketable, and for the purposes of the commerce in land required to be dealt with. And then, with regard to those small transactions which his noble and learned Friend had rightly described as being effected without an expensive deduction of title, did not they occur in Middlesex and Yorkshire, as well as in Birmingham? The existing registers of deeds in those counties were compulsory, and were much more burdensome than the registry under this Bill need be; yet they did not prevent these small transactions. What reason was there to suppose that there would be any serious addition to the cost of conveyance in connection with small transactions? There would be general rules prescribed for the process of registration, and the proceeding would be so that it was after great hesitation he had withdrawn the provisions of the Bill of last year which would make the registration compulsory. He had stated on a former occasion the reasons which had led him to that conclusion, and he ventured to think those reasons had hardly been met by the observations of his noble and learned Friend. But he would repeat that it was a question which ought to be fully discussed by the House, and he hoped it would be discussed with regard solely to the merits of the case. What he was afraid of, was attempting to force registration upon the public in a manner which might excite intense dissatisfaction, and which might lead to an effort to get rid of the new system altogether. He thought that the noble and learned Lord would find that the substitutes he proposed for the local registries would prove very unsatisfactory. He trusted, however, that his noble and learned Friend would raise the question of compulsion in Committee, in order to take the opinion of their Lordships upon the point. The Committee would be taken this day week.

After a few words from Lord WAVE-NEY,

MR. O'SULLIVAN asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether Constable Joseph Webster, together with thirty-one other constables and sub-constables, were discharged from the Royal Irish Constabulary, on the 31st of July 1873, on account of ill health and long service; and, if it was a fact that those men were thereby deprived of eight pound some odd shillings each back-pay, to which they would be justly entitled if allowed to remain in the service one day longer?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH:

The present Government are in no way responsible for what has been done. The facts of the case are, I believe, as follows:—Constable Webster and 31 other men were pronounced unfit for further service by a Medical Board on the 9th of July, 1873. According to the usual practice in such cases, their pay was made to cease on the 31st of the same month, and their pensions, to commence on the 1st of the following month. In accordance with the terms of the Act 36 & 37 Vict., c. 74, s. 1 (last paragraph), the men in question, together with many others almost similarly circumstanced—having ceased to be members of the Force before the 1st of August, 1873—were excluded from the benefits of the increased rate of pay which commenced on the 1st of December, 1872.

QUESTION.

MR. MACARTNEY asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether he proposes, after introducing a measure to establish in Ireland a new area of taxation for county purposes, to legislate further, during the present Session, with a view to alter and improve the Grand Jury Laws in that part of the Kingdom?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in reply, said, his hon. Friend seemed to have failed to apprehend the purport of the Answer which he had some time ago given to the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. O'Shaughnessy) in connection with the subject. He then intended to say that, finding the area of Poor Law chargeability was very much connected with county taxation and management, he hoped to introduce a scheme to the notice of the House which would include both those questions. He had such a scheme in preparation; but he feared some time must elapse before he could

QUESTION.

MR. WILLIAM PRICE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the neglected sanitary and educational condition of our Canal population; and, whether as a Royal Commission is about to inquire into the expediency of extending the provisions of the Factory and Workshops Acts to certain classes now exempt from their operation, he is willing to recommend that the condition of our Canal population should be included in the inquiry?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, his attention has been called to the very neglected condition, both in a sanitary and an educational point of view, of what was termed our floating population on the canals of this country. There might, however, as the children in question were not employed in workshops or in labour which came under the operation of the Factory and Workshops Acts, be some difficulty in including them in the inquiry to be made by the Commission which was about to be issued. He hoped, nevertheless, to find some remedy for the existing state of things, and he would undertake that a sufficient investigation should be made into it in a formal shape.

METROPOLIS GAS (NEW WORKS) BILL.

QUESTION.

COLONEL MAKINS asked the hon. Member for Truro, Whether it is a fact that the costs of a private Bill, the "Metropolis Gas (New Works)" introduced by the Metropolitan Board of Works, and withdrawn before the Second Reading, amount to several thousand pounds; and, whether he would state the amount and out of what funds such costs are proposed to be defrayed?

SIR JAMES HOGG, in reply, said, the accounts not having yet been received by the Metropolitan Board of Works, it was quite impossible for him to give the House any idea what the amount was. When they had been sent in they would, after due investigation, be placed under the head "Legal and Parliamentary Expenses," and would be charged in the usual manner against the revenue of the Board.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACT— SHIPPING DISASTERS.

QUESTION.

MR. MACIVER asked the President of the Board of Trade, How many prosecutions there have been under Clause 11 of the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act of 1871; and what have been the results of such prosecutions; if he is aware that ten British steamers have foundered in the Bay of Biscay during the last six months, drowning upwards of two hundred people; and how many inquiries have been held or are likely to be held in regard to these disasters; and, whether, supposing any of these vessels to have been unseaworthy, it is proposed to prosecute anybody; and, in such event, how he proposes to reach the persons responsible for the improper condition in which vessels that have gone to the bottom, with all hands, sailed from foreign ports homewardbound?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: There have been several prosecutions under consideration. The cases of the Nimrod, of Belfast, the Mary, of Glasgow, the Alcedo, of Waterford, the Ceres, of Whitehaven, and others are now in the hands of the Crown Lawyers. But there has been no Public Prosecutor hitherto; now the Board of Trade have a solicitor. Hitherto prosecutions have been conducted indirectly by correspondence between the Board of Trade and the Home Office, the Treasury, and the Law Officers. Of the 10 steamers named, five are reported as having foundered in the Bay of Biscay, with 100 lives lost; five are missing. Inquiries have been held in the first five cases—namely, the La Plata, Cortes, Mary, Clifton, and Alpha—and inquiries will be held in the other cases if any trustworthy evidence should be forthcoming. Of the first five, the Mary was found by the Court to have been unseaworthy, and the case is in the hands of the Lord Advocate for a criminal prosecution. As to homeward-bound ships from foreign ports, it is the Consul's business to report any suspicious cases, and he may summon a Naval Court which can order survey. Owners of unseaworthy ships would be prosecuted on evidence sent home by the Consul.

MR. PLIMSOLL: I beg to give Notice that to-morrow I shall ask the President of the Board of Trade, on what the other in cases of doubt or difficulty; and each of these tribunals so constituted was charged with the duty of deciding and determining questions of fact as well as of law; and against its decision, except in certain cases, there was no appeal. How was it possible to obtain, or to preserve, uniformity in the law; or to prevent dissatisfaction with decisions arrived at under such circumstances? What did the Judges themselves say on the matter? Before the Committee of 1869, Mr. Justice Willes, in reply to the question whether he would like to have four Members of Parliament associated with him, said—

“Two would be sufficient; they would afford the greatest relief to me personally, and would, I think, strengthen the tribunal.”

Mr. Justice Blackburn, before the same Committee, said—

“If two Members of Parliament would serve, it would greatly improve the tribunal, and be a means of relief to myself.”

The same learned Judge, in delivering judgment in a complicated election case, said, speaking of the difficulty of his position in having to decide alone upon the facts, that he had “to apply his common sense to the facts” before him; “but,” he added, the “common sense of one Judge must differ from the common sense of another;” and he quoted the famous saying of Selden, “that a standard of common sense on the part of Judges would be as uncertain as a measure of length of which the unit was a Judge’s foot,” and he then used these words—“I wish with all my heart that the Legislature would find out some test to relieve us from that uncertainty.” He (Mr. Serjeant Simon) did not think it possible for the Legislature to discover such a test; but it had the power, which he hoped it would exercise, of so constituting the tribunal as to relieve the Judges from undue responsibility, and assist them in arriving at satisfactory decisions upon questions of fact while securing uniformity in the decisions upon questions of law. [The hon. and learned Member then proceeded to cite a number of decisions pronounced by Election Judges, in order to show that, as the law admitted of many diverse readings, it was necessary to amend it.] For instance, he said, a lawyer hearing the term “agent” would understand it to refer to a person appointed by another to act for him under a given authority, and whose acts would bind his principal only so far as they were in accordance with the authority so given. In election matters this was different. It had been laid down that, the relation between a candidate and his agent was analogous to that of master and servant, and further, that the candidate was not only responsible for the acts of his agent, but responsible even when the agent acted contrary to, and in direct defiance of, the instructions which the candidate had given him. Purity of election was, of course, the principle upon which the law so laid down was based; but it surely was a matter well worthy of consideration whether there ought not to be some limit to this doctrine. Indeed, it was too stringent to be always acted upon, and accordingly they found that the Judges themselves had endeavoured to relax its severity, as he (Mr. Serjeant Simon) would presently show. In one case, a learned Judge held that a candidate who had instructed his agent in these words—“Do not bribe; I will not be responsible for it,” was nevertheless responsible, although the agent had positively disobeyed the instructions of the candidate. In another case, however, a learned Judge said, that where an agent acted inconsistently with the intentions and determination of the candidate, expressed in his public communications with the electors, the inference was, that the act was not authorized by the candidate, and he therefore was not responsible for them. Again, it had been decided to be immaterial whether the candidate was aware of the fact that his agent had been treating, and that even though the majority on the poll was not composed of persons treated, the seat was forfeited. In another case, however, a decision the reverse of this was given under very similar circumstances. With regard to treating, it had been laid down by a most distinguished Judge, that the intention was the test of a corrupt act, and that a thimbleful of drink given with a corrupt intention was sufficient to void an election. Another Judge, however, ruled that drink given by an agent in order to keep voters quiet who, during the election, had informed him that the other side were busily engaged in treating, was not on Election Petitions, and one learned Judge very properly described it as a means of giving gratuities in the shape of excessive payment for travelling expenses. In a well-known case—"Cooper v. Slade"—the House of Lords decided that a promise to pay a voter's travelling expenses, conditionally upon his voting for a particular candidate, was an offence under 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102; but the Judges were divided in opinion as to whether an unconditional promise—that was to say, a mere promise to pay a man's expenses for going to vote, without specifying how he should vote—was a corrupt act. A statute was afterwards passed, the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 87, declaring that to provide a conveyance was lawful, but that it should not be lawful to pay any money, or give any valuable consideration to a voter for, or in respect of, his travelling expenses. It has since been held that, to provide a railway pass for a voter was not unlawful, while in another case the permission to tenants to shoot rabbits was declared to be corrupt, because rabbits had a money value. That was perfectly true; but it might occur to some that a railway pass had also a money value. It certainly had been so treated. In the Launceston case, the circumstances were these—The gentleman who was unseated, on coming in to the property, like his predecessors, reserved, or continued to reserve, the right of shooting the game on his estate. Complaints having been made by some of the tenants of the injury done by the ground game, he, like a good landlord, made arrangements for trapping them, and dividing some of the proceeds of their sale among the tenants who had been injured. This was some time before the election, and when the election was not thought of, and could not have been thought of. When the election came on, the rabbit grievance was brought up against him; and, finding himself unpopular, in a speech which he made during the election, referring to the rabbit grievance, he told his tenants to shoot all the rabbits, and do what they liked with them. "I am anxious," he said, "that every rabbit should be killed, and every tenant is at liberty to kill them as he can." The gentleman was unseated for giving this permission, on the ground, as he (Mr. Serjeant Simon) had said, that the rabbits had a money value. He (Mr.

Serjeant Simon) did not presume to question the decision. He pronounced no opinion upon it. All he wished to say was this—and it was his chief object in referring to the case—that the decision had excited much attention, and much surprise, and dissatisfaction had been expressed at it, and that this would not have been the case if the tribunal that pronounced it had been composed of more than a single Judge. So also of the Windsor case. Much astonishment and dissatisfaction had been expressed at the result of that case, and for the reasons assigned in the judgment. He (Mr. Serjeant Simon) did not feel it necessary to detain the House by discussing a question of casuistry as to whether, or how far, or in what degree, a good motive was tainted or destroyed by a bad one, or whether an illegal motive vitiated an act which of itself would otherwise be legal. He referred to this case simply as another instance of a class of cases as to which no amount of judicial learning or ability would render the decision of a single Judge satisfactory. He had hitherto referred to cases tried by single Judges. He had before him abstracts of 40 election cases; but he thought he had shown enough to satisfy the House that discrepancies were inevitable where they had a number of tribunals, each composed of a single Judge, and that confusion in the law must be the result where there was no general controlling power. He would refer to two cases more, however, in one of which the Judges of a Superior Court had differed among themselves, and where two Superior Courts had differed from each other. In the Galway case, the Court of Common Pleas in Ireland unseated a Member, the Chief Justice differing from the other Judges. The same question arose here out of the Launceston case. The question to which he (Mr. Serjeant Simon) referred was, as to the ineligibility of the candidate, and the time when, after certain acts, the ineligibility commenced. The Common Pleas of England gave a decision the very reverse of the decision of the Common Pleas of Ireland. They had thus two superior tribunals—the ultimate Courts of Appeal in each country—differing from each other, the one over-ruling the judgment of the other, upon the self-same question. But he (Mr. Serjeant to say about the working of the Act. His object had been simply to point out the inevitable results—and only as inevitable results—the discrepancies and uncertainty in the law, and in the decisions arising out of the present system of a large number of independent and varying tribunals, composed of single Judges, called upon to decide both law and fact. But it might be asked—“What do you propose as a remedy for the evils you have pointed out?” What sort of tribunal would you have? It was not for him (Mr. Serjeant Simon) to provide a remedy. That was the duty of Her Majesty’s Government. The subject was one specially within their province. There were also on the Treasury Bench several Members of the Government that brought forward the Bill of 1868, and caused it to be passed into law; and the present Prime Minister, he believed, had himself introduced it, if he was not the author of it. But if the Government should decline the task, then he would say that the proper course would be to refer the whole matter to a Select Committee. Without presuming to prescribe what should be done, he would throw out a suggestion or two which a Committee might fairly consider. A learned friend of his, Mr. Serjeant Pulling—a gentleman of great learning and ability—had devoted much attention to the subject when the matter was before the Committee in 1869, and in a pamphlet which he wrote, he recommended that the revising barrister, as assessor to the returning officer, should, immediately after an election, go down to the place, and hold an inquiry into the proceedings and deal summarily with all corrupt practices, and in certain cases where the return was questioned, the County Court Judge of the district should preside and inquire into the return along with them. Another suggestion which he (Mr. Serjeant Simon) would venture to make was, that the Election Judges should conduct the inquiry and simply report to the House, and that there should be a Standing Committee of its most experienced Members, to consider and determine upon the Report. The House would thus retain the power which it had so long exercised, and the Judges would be relieved from undue responsibility, while their Reports would be received with confidence and respect by the Committee, and by the House. Another mode was suggested before the Committee of 1869, and that was to associate two or more Members of the House with the Judges. This, perhaps, would be the best possible method under the circumstances. The Judges, or some of them, as he had shown, had borne their testimony in favour of this plan. It would greatly assist and relieve them in trying the facts, and the right of appeal, not limited as it now was, but given as of right, upon all questions of law, would have the effect of keeping the law straight, and preserving uniformity, which was impossible under the present system. One subject more, and he had done. He would refer to it but briefly. It was supposed that in transferring the trial of Election Petition to the Judges there would be great saving of expense, especially as to the witnesses, who had formerly to be brought from remote places, and kept in town while the inquiry was going on. But the saving had not been so great after all, for against it there was the expense of three new Judges, and the taking them, with their suite, to the town where the trial took place. This expense fell upon the country; and besides that, there was the expense of special retainers, and heavy fees to counsel, which fell upon candidates and others concerned in the case, and which were considerably greater than they were when the cases were tried in town. He had now only to say how sensible he was of the kind attention with which the House had listened to his remarks upon a subject which, however important and interesting to them, was necessarily of a very dry character. The hon. and learned Gentleman concluded by moving the appointment of the Committee.

SIR COLMAN O’LOGHLEN, in seconding the Motion, said, he thought the time had come when the Act of 1868, which for the first time took away a jurisdiction which existed in this and every other Legislative Assembly, and gave to persons outside the power to determine the right to sit in the House, should be considered by a Select Committee. He himself last year gave Notice of his intention to move for a Select Committee on the subject; but he had not an opportunity of bringing it before the House. The Act was origi-

there were other matters connected with the subject which also deserved attention. It was provided in the Act that in November of each year one of the Puisne Judges of each Court not being a Member of the House of Lords should be placed on the rota to try Election Petitions during the ensuing year. It was not usual for Puisne Judges to be Members of the House of Lords; it was possible, however, that some might be, but he presumed that this House thought that Members of the House of Lords should not interfere in the Election Petitions. And yet Lord Coleridge, a Member of the House of Lords presided over the Court of Common Pleas, and on an appeal to that Court might decide on the right of persons to sit in the House of Commons. He had called attention to this point, because it seemed to show some inconsistency in the policy of the Act. He thought there ought to be some Court of Ultimate Appeal from the decision of the Court of Common Pleas, and he suggested it should go to whatever Court might be established by Parliament as the Final Appeal Court of the Kingdom. In the case of the Drogheda Election Petition, Mr. Justice Barry referred a certain question to the decision of the Common Pleas in Ireland, and the Court being equally divided, was unable to give judgment. The case was remitted back to Mr. Justice Barry to give a decision as best he could, and he was obliged to do so. This was one of the most important questions which could be referred to a Select Committee; before it every one would have an opportunity of placing his views, and he trusted that a satisfactory conclusion would result from its labours.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the working of the 'Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868,' and to report what, if any, amendments are necessary."—(Mr. Serjeant Simon.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that the subject to which his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dewsbury (Mr. Serjeant Simon) had drawn the attention of the House was one which had been under the consideration of Her Majesty's Government for some little time, in consequence, among other causes, of the circumstances to which the right hon. and learned Member for Clare (Sir Colman O'Loughlen) had referred. The House was aware that the Act of 1868 would expire at the close of the present year, and it would, therefore, become necessary to do one of three things:—to include it again in the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill—against which there was a strong expression of opinion at the close of last Session—or to bring in a separate Bill to continue or amend the Act, or to appoint a Select Committee to inquire into the working of the Act. The conclusion the Government had arrived at—and he might say they had done so before the Notice of the hon. and learned Member was placed upon the Paper—was, that, under all the circumstances, to proceed by the appointment of a Select Committee would be the best course. He understood from the observations of both his hon. and learned Friends that, in their opinion, the appointment of such a Committee should be made at the instance of the Government, and that it should be done during the present Session. He believed he might say that the Government would ask the House to appoint a Select Committee for the purpose of dealing with this question. It would be necessary, however, to consider a little more in detail the form of the Resolution by which the Committee should be appointed, and for this reason—that another very important Act connected with elections, the Act of 1854, would also expire at the close of this year. Under these circumstances, it would be undesirable that he should attempt to follow his hon. and learned Friends in discussing the general merits of the question. There was one thing, however, which he was glad to hear from the right hon. and learned Member for Clare, and that was that he had no desire to alter the character of the tribunal by which Election Petitions were to be tried—a tribunal which he (the Attorney General) thought had given general satisfaction. At the same time, there was force in the observation that the proceedings of the tribunal might be, in some respects, improved. He desired, however, to say that he did not concur in the opinion that there was so great a discrepancy in the decisions of the learned Judges as his hon. and learned Friends thought. He desired, however, to say that he did not concur in the opinion that there was so great a discrepancy in the decisions of the learned Judges as his hon. and learned Friends thought. A very difficult duty had been cast upon the Judges, and he thought their decisions could be nally introduced by the present Prime Minister as a permanent law; but on the suggestion of Mr. Mill, the late Member for Westminster, its operation was limited to three years. It expired in 1872, and had since been annually renewed by the Expiring Laws Bill without being submitted to the consideration of the House—a practice “more honoured in the breach than in the observance.” He found that the number of Petitions tried under the Act since it passed in 1868 was 48 relating to English constituencies in the last Parliament, and 21 in the present Parliament, making together 69; while in Ireland 17 cases were tried during the last Parliament, and four in the present Parliament, a total of 21; and in Scotland during the last Parliament one, and in the present Parliament three. It was complained of the old system that it gave rise to great and unnecessary expense and inconsistent and uncertain decisions. After the speech of his hon. and learned Friend there could be little doubt that under the present practice the state of things had not much improved. They had not got rid of inconsistent and uncertain decisions, and the expenses equalled, if they did not in some cases exceed, those of former days. Last Session he moved for a Return of the taxed costs, and he found that the average costs of each party in England was from £1,000 to £1,500. In the Oldham case the taxed costs amounted to £3,036 3s. 6d., and in the Southampton case to £2,951 6s. 4d. In Ireland the costs averaged from £1,000 to £1,500. The taxed costs of the petitioner in the Galway case amounted to no less a sum than £6,789 17s. 2d. Then some of the decisions had surprised him a good deal. For instance, in the Windsor case the following passage occurred in Baron Bramwell’s judgment:—

“As I have endeavoured to explain, I do not think that the considerations on which I am going to decide the case will be intelligible to any but lawyers.”

For an Election Judge to so decide a case was not a satisfactory administration of the law. There were also the contradictory decisions in the Galway and Launceston cases. In the first a decision was pronounced seating a Member which the Court of Common Pleas in England would not follow because it did not think it was law. They had two decisions of Ultimate Courts of Appeal different ways, and there were no means, except by Act of Parliament, of declaring what was the real law. The question arose, what was to be done under the circumstances? He was strongly opposed to transferring the consideration of Election Petitions from Members of the House to the Judges, and he agreed fully in the Letter of the Lord Chief Justice, laid on the Table, in which he said that the House was imposing on the Judges a duty which would expose them to great odium and was foreign to the purpose for which they were appointed. Forty years ago a Committee presided over by Mr. Buller, the only surviving Member of which he believed was his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Roebuck), came to the same conclusion—that duties of this nature ought not to be given to the Judges. Facilis est descensus—and he feared it was now too late to take away from the Judges the power of deciding in election cases. He thought, however, that every Election Petition ought to be tried by two Judges instead of by one; and if the two could not agree the election ought to stand, and the successful candidate should be allowed to take his seat. It would be said they had not a judicial staff for the purpose; but that was a mere question of expense. A very serious matter was that if the Judge reported against any persons for bribery or corrupt practices they were exposed to a species of outlawry for a period of seven years, and yet they had no appeal from his decision. They had not even an opportunity of being heard before the Judge who reported their names. A remarkable, and now historical case, that of Galway, was a good illustration of that hardship. In that case Mr. Justice Keogh reported against the Archbishop of Tuam and two Bishops for corrupt practices or undue influence, and an Order was made by the House that they should be prosecuted by the Attorney General. One of the Bishops was tried before a Judge and a jury, and he was acquitted, to the satisfaction of everyone who heard the evidence. Still, he remained disqualified, under the Report of Justice Keogh, from taking part in any election until the seven years had expired, and the Archbishop and other Bishop were in the same position. But there were other matters connected with the subject which also deserved attention. It was provided in the Act that in November of each year one of the Puisne Judges of each Court not being a Member of the House of Lords should be placed on the rota to try Election Petitions during the ensuing year. A very difficult duty had been cast upon the Judges, and he thought their decisions could be reconciled when the different circumstances which affected their opinions were taken into consideration. Whether those discrepancies did exist or not, as also the various circumstances affecting them, could be all inquired into by the Committee. If his hon. and learned Friend thought it consistent with his duty to withdraw his Motion, he would undertake, on the part of the Government, to move on a future day for a Select Committee.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER entirely concurred in the Motion, but not in the remedies which had been suggested by the Mover and Seconder. When the Bill of 1868 was before the House, taking away the jurisdiction of the House, and giving it to a single Judge without a jury, he thought it was a very extraordinary and unconstitutional measure. How did the matter stand? If a man was indicted for an offence which would subject him only to a light fine or imprisonment, he had a right to be tried by a jury; and yet a Member of Parliament could be convicted without trial by jury, and by the Act of a single Judge, and subjected not only to the forfeiture of his seat in this House, but to grave disabilities. He had the greatest respect for the Judges; but the Judges were not trained or accustomed to try issues of fact without the assistance of a jury, and that accounted for the unsatisfactory nature of their decisions. With regard to the question of providing a remedy for the present state of things, he would remind the House that anciently the validity of returns of Members of Parliament could be tried at Common Law, on the return being traversed in the Court of Chancery, and sent for trial to the Court of Common Pleas. Moreover, there were two ancient statutes which bore upon this question—11 Henry IV. c. 1, and 6 Henry VI. c. 4—the former providing for an inquiry by a method resembling a coroner's inquest, whilst under the latter the inquiry was before a Judge and a jury at the Assizes; and it was a matter of grave consideration whether it would not be expedient to revert to the old principle of the Common Law and of the Constitution and provide for the trial of those questions as to the election of Members of Parliament before a jury. What he would suggest, was that where the return of a Member of Parliament was questioned in point of law, the Petition should be heard and determined, not by the Lord Chancellor, as was formerly the case, but by the full Court of Common Pleas or the full Court of Queen's Bench; and that, where the return was questioned on matters of fact, the trial should be before a Judge and a special jury—a course which would be in accordance not only with the ancient law of this country, but with the principle that cases of this kind should be decided by the Commons, and that a man should be tried by his Peers. He did not wish to prolong the discussion now, but threw out the suggestion with the view of ventilating the subject.

SIR WILLIAM FRASER recommended that the question as to the amount of deposit required to be made by petitioners should be taken into consideration by the Committee, as he thought that the present amount of £1,000 was totally inadequate.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON said that, after the statement made by the Attorney General, he would readily withdraw his Motion. His only object was to procure inquiry, and he thought that object would be best attained by means of a Committee.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

SIR HENRY JAMES rose to move that a Select Committee be appointed—

“To inquire into the circumstances attending the making of Contracts for Loans with certain Foreign States, and also the causes which have led to the non-payment of the principal moneys and interest due in respect of such Loans.”

The hon. and learned Member said: I can assure the House that I am sensible of the responsible nature of the task I have undertaken in submitting the Motion with which I shall conclude my observations. I am sensible of that responsibility, especially, because I feel that in the course of the statement I am about to make to the House, I shall, of necessity, be making charges against certain persons resident in this country; but, for my own part, I shall content myself with making a simple, and, I trust, a brief statement of certain facts which I think sufficient to justify the inquiry I am seeking for. If those inquiries subsequently prove the existence of those facts, the facts themselves must be answerable for the charge, and not the person who introduces the Motion. Perhaps it may be in the knowledge of many hon. Members that at this moment the amount of foreign debt in relation to which there is default amounts to the large sum of £240,000,000. The extent to which that stock is held by creditors in this country I am unable to state to the House; but without doubt a portion of that sum of £240,000,000 is very largely held by English creditors. In relation to many of the countries that are in default, I do not seek to apply this Motion. In those cases the circumstances under which the loans have been raised have all been known to, and probably investigated by, the Government of this country in past times. I am not seeking to re-open those questions. I am not asking Her Majesty's Government to interfere on behalf of the English creditors against all those States that have made default. It is a burden which, according to the habits of Governments, I do not say they ought to bear; but I am endeavouring to deal with, and if possible to destroy, a system that has sprung up comparatively of late years, of bankrupt States, knowing themselves to be in a state of complete bankruptcy, recklessly coming into this English market and endeavouring to obtain from English creditors money which it is clear that those States can never repay. I am anxious also to deal with the system under which the agents of those States, according to the statements of their own Governments, have appropriated and retained that money on its way from English creditors to the State for which it has been borrowed, in order, if possible, to destroy that system. I think I can show there is no remedy existing now, without inquiry, and I am asking this House to aid in achieving a good end by allowing this inquiry to take place. The States to which I wish to call attention now—not that they form the whole of the States that have made default, but which I wish to place before the House rather as examples than as including the entire case—are Honduras, Costa Rica, San Domingo, and Paraguay. My statement as to Honduras is very simple, and the House will pardon me if I think it necessary to occupy its time in briefly glancing at the condition of that State, and the circumstances under which these loans have been obtained in this country, and the way in which they have been applied by the persons who, without doubt, received the money. As far as we know—and our knowledge of the place is very limited—Honduras is a State that contains some 250,000 inhabitants. A great proportion of these are aborigines, so scattered through the country that no Census can be taken, and certainly they do not form a population capable of bearing much taxation. Their revenue, so far as it can be traced, has never exceeded £100,000 annually, and out of that £100,000 all the expenses of their internal administration, of their Army and diplomatic officials, have to come. What little further is known of Honduras does not tend to show that its resources are very great; because in 1839, when the debt of the Federate States was divided into 12 parts, it had to bear 2-12ths of that amount, the sum it had to pay being £27,000, bearing interest at 10 per cent till 1867. Honduras was in such a state of insolvency it never was able to pay that amount; and the arrears amounting to £92,000, it had to do what many an insolvent person has had to do—namely, to compound with its creditors. It admitted its insolvency in May, 1867, and asked its creditors, in lieu of the £92,000, to accept £50,000 in bonds, bearing a lower rate of interest. I assume that Honduras was unable to pay its debts; and, that being its not unnatural condition—looking at its revenue in May, 1867—it commenced a new life as early as November, 1867. In that month the Minister of Honduras, a gentleman whose name must be mentioned, Senor Gutierrez, the accredited Minister to this country, introduced a loan of £1,000,000, and it was issued at such a price that the loan produced the sum of £800,000, bearing interest at the rate of 10 per cent. Senor Gutierrez issued his own prospectus, and, as Minister of Honduras, he asked the English capitalists to invest money by way of loan to his Government, and he made certain distinct statements as to the application of the loan. It was to be applied to the construction of the first section of a railway—the first section to be 56 miles in length. He said a contract had been entered into for making it for £18,000 per mile, and that it would be amply sufficient if that section were completed, to provide for the future completion of the remaining sections tinct when it was announced originally that the money was to be applied to the construction of the railway, that the forests of Honduras were mortgaged, so that the creditors should receive the results of those forests. I will tell the House that whilst £4,800,000 has been paid to the financial agents of Honduras through Messrs. Bischoffsheim and Goldschmidt, or to the financial agents in this country, so far as can be discovered out of that £4,800,000, only £562,000 has been applied to the construction of the railway. The rest is lost sight of. The railway remains. It is in existence, but it is abandoned—it is perfectly useless; and as to the forests, so far as is known, not one piece of timber from the Honduras forests has ever come to this country. If any has, the financial agents do not know about it. The result is that of that £4,800,000 all that the English creditor can obtain by way of answer is that there is a certain tin box in the Bank of England. It is stated there was a sort of general bond that was to give full security to all the English creditors. I hold in my hand a correspondence between a gentleman at Glasgow and the Bank of England. The gentleman applied to the Bank of England to know what was the security, and the answer he obtained from the representative of the Bank of England was this—

“In reply to your letter of yesterday, I beg to state that the box, said to contain the general bond of the Honduras Loan, has been deposited with the Bank of England; but as the Bank are only the custodians of a locked box, with the contents of which they are not acquainted, I am unable to give you any further information on the subject.”

Senor Gutierrez keeps the key, and what is in that box no one has been able to discover. And that is all that remains, for there is a repudiation of Honduras to pay this sum of money. All that remains is, then, this locked box. A gentleman who has sent me that information tells me of another box. He says—

“Many hundreds and hundreds of letters lie in the tin box here (Glasgow) from people ill able to afford the frightful losses sustained. All of the same tenour. Naval and military men obliged to leave the service to find other employment to maintain their families, widows re-

What I believe is this—that all that remains, and all that the creditors are likely to obtain, is the expression of their judgment on the fraud, for they can never obtain any compensation from the State. I do not stop now to endeavour to show to this House that those who have received that money should give it up. Everything I have stated I have proof of under my hand. The prospectus is now on this Table. I pass quickly on to the statement in relation to the loan of Costa Rica; and the reason why I mention this next is, that it is a singular fact that, although not making himself very conspicuous in the country, the same gentleman, Senor Gutierrez, is responsible for this. He was appointed to this country as Representative for Costa Rica in November, 1870, and soon after that, or early in 1871, he dealt with Costa Rica as he had done with Honduras, and introduced a loan of £1,000,000, for which he received £720,500. Immediately afterwards—that is to say in the following year, 1872—he introduced a loan for £2,000,000, or rather the State of Costa Rica authorized it, and a sum of £1,200,000 was obtained; so that the State has obtained altogether the sum of £2,000,000. All the amount that we can find to have been sent to Costa Rica of that sum is £926,000; the rest has been detained from going there. One statement is made in the prospectus of this loan which of course is interesting to every one. It is that the Representative of the British Government is the person in whom certain Customs duties have been vested, and that he will forward the proceeds of those duties to this country. I will assume that the Representative of the British Government has received those duties; but whether he was ever authorized to do so, I do not know. A clergyman writing to me from the North of Ireland, sends me a copy of the statement made to him by the financial agents of this loan, Messrs. Bischoffsheim and Goldschmidt, who say they know nothing of the Representative of the British Government being authorised to receive these duties. They say, writing on the 16th July, 1874—

ment of the second ent Loan, to which

city of Don Carlos Gutierrez, the Minister for the State of Costa Rica in this country, who vouched for the truth of it by signing the prospectus, and as we received the remittances through Mr. Corbett, we had every reason to believe it was true."

The remittances have ceased from Honduras, and not a sixpence has been received on either of the Costa Rica loans. The next loan—the San Domingo Loan—is a comparatively small matter; yet the gentleman who took charge of the loan is one whose enterprising character is worthy of note, if not of commendation, for although the loan is small, he took the whole of it, or very nearly. It was introduced in 1869 for £757,000, and at the price of issue the enterprising contractor obtained the sum of £529,000. I have had an opportunity of reading the shorthand writer's note of that gentleman's account of the affair in the trial in which he appeared; and the result of his statement is, that the San Domingo Government only received £50,000, and that was sent back again. There is some doubt whether they have not recovered £37,000, which I will assume they did. At any rate, they had no more of the £529,000 than the sum of £37,000; and the contractor puts such a value on his own services, that he has a heavy claim on the San Domingo Government for having introduced the loan to England. His name, like so many others of his class, is not an English one; it is Hertzby Hartmont. I have to deal with only one State more. The next is that of Paraguay, the revenue of which is put down at £110,000. In 1871, a loan was introduced nominally for £1,000,000, and the amount actually raised was £800,000. All these loans follow the same course. As soon as the money is obtained, which seems so easy to get, in the year 1872 another loan, which produced in actual money £1,640,000, was subscribed by the English public, making the total approximate amount £2,500,000. The prospectus introducing the loan stated that it was the first public debt of Paraguay, and that Paraguay had no funded debt. I will not answer for the truth of the statement, but that book to which we are all in the habit of referring, The Statesman's Year Book, alleges that the debt of Paraguay amounted at that time, in consequence of the war, to £47,200,000, and I have seen no contradiction of that statement on the part of the gentleman who introduced the prospectus. But, whatever the truth as to the indebtedness of Paraguay at that time, the material point for consideration is—what has become of the money which the British public subscribed? I hold in my hand a communication from the gentlemen who now represent the Government of Paraguay in this country. They say—"In order that you may form an exact idea of the troubles of the Government after receiving the said advice, we will only tell you that of the loan of 1872"—which amounted to £2,000,000 nominally—"we have only received £239,687." The effect of that on Paraguay is stated to be that not only has Paraguay not received the money contracted for, which was all subscribed, thus losing the benefits she was entitled to look for, but for the want of that money the principal sources of the wealth of the country have had to suffer; it has sustained losses in respect to its agricultural development, railway works have had to be suspended, public buildings have sustained serious damage for want of repair, and the Government have had to pay, and are still paying, increased interest for the obligations contracted on the receipt of the advice that all the loan had been subscribed. ["Name."] There is some difficulty in ascertaining who is the contractor, and that I may not do an injustice to anyone, I had better not mention any names. I have now mentioned all the instances I think it necessary to give to justify the necessity of this inquiry. I have been asked—what is it you intend to do when this inquiry has taken place? I tell the House very frankly that I really do not know what ought to be done, or what is the proper remedy of an evil, until we have traced that evil to its source, and ascertained what it is against which we have to contend. But, at any rate, we should obtain exposure. We shall obtain the exposure which will give warning to the unwary, and prevent the repetition of such offences by men placing their views before the public in the way they have done in the past. There are many aspects of this evil against which we may have to apply this remedy, if I am right in what I said a few minutes since. I am not pressing on the Government the obligation that they, representing the State, should always fight the battle of the English private creditor. But there is this condition of things—that if a State, knowing it is impossible to pay a debt, that it is in a bankrupt condition, comes into this country and takes away money from the people of this country, it is obtaining money by way of false pretences. And I believe it is a question worth consideration by those who take care of the interest and honour of this State, whether some action ought not then to be taken by the Government to prevent such proceedings by foreign States against our people. May I detain the House a few minutes longer by reading the views of Lord Palmerston as to the intervention of the State on behalf of a private creditor against a foreign State which did not pay what was due from it? It was on a Motion brought by Lord George Bentinck, in June, 1847, when he endeavoured to impress on the then Government the necessity of enforcing the claims of the English bondholder against Spain. Lord Palmerston said it was always a question of expediency whether a State should interfere or not on behalf of a creditor. He admitted that it was, under certain circumstances, an obligation to interfere, and he concludes thus—

“Although I entreat the House, upon grounds of public policy, not to impose at present upon Her Majesty’s Government the obligations which the proposed Address would throw upon them, yet I would take this opportunity of warning foreign Governments who are the debtors to British subjects, that the time may come when this House will no longer sit patient under the wrongs and injustice inflicted upon the subjects of this country. I would warn them that the time may come when the British nation will not see with tranquillity the sum of £150,000,000 due to British subjects, and the interest, not paid. And I would warn them that if they do not make proper efforts adequately to fulfil their engagements, the Government of this country, whatever men may be in office, may be compelled by the force of public opinion, and by the votes of Parliament, to depart from that which hitherto has been the established practice of England, and to insist upon the payment of debts due to British subjects. That we have the means of enforcing the rights of British subjects, I am not prepared to dispute. It is not because we are afraid of these States, or all of them put together, that we have refrained from taking the steps which my noble Friend would urge. England, I trust, will always have the means of obtaining justice for its subjects from any country upon the face of the earth. But this is a question of expediency, and not a question of power; therefore let no foreign country who has done wrong to British subjects deceive itself by a false impression either that the British nation or the British Parliament will for ever remain patient under the wrong; or that, if called upon to enforce the rights of the people of England, the Government of England will not have ample power and means at its command to obtain justice for them.” — [3 Hansard, xciii. 1305.]

But there is another view—if it should turn out that the States have not authorized the loans, that the agents have not remitted the money, that they have not fulfilled the obligations they gave personally, then am I to ask the House, is there no remedy against them for such proceedings? At present we have no means of proceeding against the Representatives of foreign States. They are free from process, and free from any proceeding in our Courts, and we now see how some of the Representatives of these States, entering into semi-contracts, after making these statements, are able to set everything at defiance. There is only one other statement I wish to make. I have heard some objection made to this inquiry. It is said, in the first place, Why should not people look after themselves? Why, if they are credulous, should you seek to protect them? Well, why should we not protect the credulous as well as any other person who is the victim of fraud and deceit? However foolish he may be, why should he not be protected? I cannot understand the argument that can be used by those who are the friends and partizans of some of those who have introduced these loans, when they say that there ought to be no protection against these false statements. It is also said that litigation is pending. It is litigation, however, of which I only know by rumour and report, and I protest against this House being relieved from the duty of inquiry, because one individual bondholder is trying to obtain £1,000 of his own money, not against the particular State, but against some individual contractor, against whom he may or may not succeed. The litigation may go on for 10 or 15 years, and all prove futile, and in its result will probably be so. I can only say that, if this Committee be granted, and if there be shown that there is any injustice to any individual, then will be the time to ascertain how far the inquiry should be pushed. One word more in support of this Motion. Is it not just to these gentlemen who have issued these prospectuses and received this money that this inquiry should take place? These statements have been mentioned and referred to in the public prints, and with very great distinctness to-night; surely, therefore, these gentlemen will not wish that no inquiry should take place. Will they not rather be ready to afford every explanation? Whatever may be the view of this House, I have brought this Motion forward, accepting a labour which is not a pleasant one to me, and taking some little trouble about the matter, in the hope that restitution may be indirectly obtained for those whom I deem to have in some instances been the subjects of fraud, and that we may also protest against a continuation of this system, and rid from our midst men who are careless alike of our national name and everything save and except that of putting money into their own pockets. The hon. and learned Gentleman concluded by moving for the appointment of the Committee.

MR. CHARLES LEWIS said, the question raised was one worthy of the consideration of Parliament and of the country. There could be no doubt that the system complained of by the hon. and learned Member was surrounded by very great scandals, and had produced great distress among the class of persons who were in the habit of investing small sums of money. This arose mainly from two causes. In the first place, the investing public evinced a reckless determination to act upon prospectuses which offered high rates of interest; and, in the second, they became infected with the gambling spirit engendered by the system of annual drawings, under which, if lucky, persons who had invested, say, £75 in the purchase of a £100 foreign bond, might—if the borrowing State happened to be solvent—obtain payment of the £100 in addition to a high rate of interest after the lapse of a very few years. He did not want the House to forget the principle of caveat emptor, but he hoped some protection would be extended to those who were misled and helpless. The House might deal with the matter by having a system of registration in order to let the creditors know with whom they were dealing, and how far the debentures were proper and legitimate instruments to bind those Governments to the performance of their obligations. He hoped some system of registration would be enforced, and that it would be made illegal for persons to advertise without complying with certain regulations, the issue of foreign loans, and this would enable persons to trace out those with whom they were dealing. No one could accuse the hon. and learned Gentleman of any exaggeration; but he (Mr. C. Lewis) knew from good authority that the hon. and learned Gentleman had been misled as to Paraguay. The issue of loans for that State had been £2,000,000 or £3,000,000; but the amount really due to the public was only £1,000,000. He (Mr. C. Lewis) had ascertained this fact in the course of a judicial investigation. He believed that that loan was only nominally issued by the promoters. He agreed entirely with the principle of the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman; and, in the main, with the Motion.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, it was evident from the way in which the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir Henry James) had been received, that the House sympathised with his expressions of indignation at the stories he had felt it his duty to bring before the House. Everybody must feel at the same time that however much they might be disposed to smile on one occasion and be angry on another at the simplicity of those who fall into these traps, yet it was melancholy to think that the principal sufferers upon whom the blow fell with the greatest severity were those people who were least able to protect themselves. Nobody could wonder that the hon. and learned Gentleman, having had his attention called to this subject, should have called the attention of the House to it. But they had to consider what was the proposition that he made to them. He asked that they should appoint a Select Committee of the House for the purpose of investigating these complaints and of endeavouring to discover some remedy for the evils which existed. He told them very frankly that he was not able himself to suggest a remedy; but that he believed the investigation which might be made before a Committee would lead to the discovery of one. Well, it was a matter for consideration how far it was desirable to appoint a Committee without any very clear and definite ideas of the line which they were to take and of the issue at which they were to arrive. The House, therefore, ought to consider carefully what they were about when they agreed, if they did agree, to the Motion of the hon. and learned Gentleman. There were one or two considerations they must bear in mind. In the first place, they had to consider how any proceedings they might take might affect our relations with foreign Governments. That, of course, was a serious question, but it was one which the Government had considered, and which had been brought specially under the notice of his noble Friend (Lord Derby) since Notice had been given by the hon. and learned Gentleman. He (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) was in a position to state that Lord Derby, after carefully considering the question, was of opinion that there was nothing in the proposal of the hon. and learned Gentleman that need in any way produce difficulties between us and foreign States. If the Government had felt that it might embarrass our foreign relations they would have felt it their duty to state so to the House, and they might have been inclined to resist the Motion of the hon. and learned Gentleman; but he desired to say, on behalf of the Government and of his noble Friend, that he was prepared, so far as the Foreign Office was concerned, to waive any objection that might be suggested of a possible complication with foreign Governments, merely stipulating that due caution should be taken in any inquiry the House might make properly to observe all the courtesies and privileges of foreign Representatives. Well, then, there was another question which arose out of the proposal, which was this—Everybody must feel that when any story of fraud, and of suffering which resulted from fraud was brought before any body of Englishmen, there was a natural desire to come forward and see whether they could not obtain some redress or devise some mode of punishing that fraud. But the House must always be careful to consider whether the particular body to whom the appeal was made was precisely the body whose business it was to come forward in the matter. And they must bear in mind that there were many tales of wrong—moving tales of wrong—that might be brought before Parliament which it did not belong properly to the functions of Parliament to deal with. They must take care that they did not interfere in any way with the proceedings of the Courts of Law; that they did not arrogate to themselves duties which more properly belonged to the legal tribunals of the country. They must not turn a Committee of the House into anything of the nature of a Star Chamber. They must bear in mind that Committees of the House in conducting inquiries had not usually the same advantages for the investigation of questions of a judicial character as were possessed by the ordinary Courts of Law, whose business it was. He thought the House, whatever sympathy or indignation they might feel, should be very cautious indeed how they undertook a duty which might be discharged by an ordinary tribunal. Nevertheless, he was bound to say, speaking on behalf of the Government, that after listening to the statement of the hon. and learned Gentleman, they did think that there were in the case he had laid before the House circumstances of so peculiar a character that they seemed to justify a departure from the ordinary cautious rule of the House. They must be very careful to draw a line in these cases. They knew it might be very easy to push cases of this kind a little further; and, as was said in common parlance, "hard cases make bad law." It might very possibly be that if they undertook to make inquiries into cases of an extraordinary and exceptional character, they might ultimately find themselves in a position of some embarrassment and difficulty. They must also bear in mind that a great number of cases which arose with respect to foreign loans, were cases of a very different character from those which were referred to by the hon. and learned Gentleman, and were cases in which they should be doing a great deal of mischief, and, perhaps, a great deal of injury to the country if they attempted to interfere. Therefore, it must be with extreme caution and consideration that they entered into the inquiries which the hon. and learned Gentleman proposed to them. But the motives which led the Government to believe it was desirable to grant this Committee were these—they found from the statement of the hon. and learned Gentleman that there was not at present, in his opinion—and his opinion upon the subject must be looked upon as a very high one—any sufficient and satisfactory way of dealing with cases of this kind such as there was in cases of ordinary fraud. The hon. and learned Gentleman told the House he could not discover a remedy, but that he thought if a Committee were appointed, they might, by investigating the case more fully, be able to discover a remedy. And this, at least, was quite certain—that if the House were to legislate at all upon the question of foreign loans, it was extremely important that they should be able to investigate these cases very carefully, and have lights thrown upon them by persons who were able to give them information with regard to foreign loans of different characters, so that care might be taken in any legislation they might undertake not to do mischief in the case of those foreign loans which were wholly free from any taint such as that referred to by the hon. and learned Gentleman. Therefore, upon the whole, with great caution and some misgiving lest it should be drawn into a precedent for going beyond the circumstances of the present case, the Government did, for the sake of endeavouring to find out a way to some legislation that might meet cases of this kind, assent to the appointment of a Committee. But he hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman would put himself in communication with the Government, and that great care might be taken in the selection of the Gentlemen appointed to serve upon the Committee, and that great care might also be exercised in the conduct of the inquiry. He was quite satisfied, from the way in which the hon. and learned Gentleman had made this Motion, that he was prepared to proceed upon it in that spirit, and in that spirit it was that he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) assented to the Motion.

Motion agreed to.

Select Committee appointed, "to inquire into the circumstances attending the making of Contracts for Loans with certain Foreign States, and also the causes which have led to the non-payment of the principal moneys and interest due in respect of such Loans."—(Sir Henry James.)

And, on March 1, Committee nominated as follows:—Mr. LOWE, Mr. STEPHEN CAVE, Mr. ELLICE, Mr. BOURKE, Mr. SOLICITOR GENERAL, Mr. WATKIN WILLIAMS, Mr. EDWARD STANHOPE, Mr. WALTER, Sir CHARLES RUSSELL, Sir CHARLES MILLS, Mr. PULESTON, and Sir HENRY JAMES:—Power to send for persons, papers, and records; Five to be the quorum.

GENERAL CARRIERS ACT (1830.)

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. JACKSON, in moving that a Select Committee be appointed "to inquire into the operation of the Act 11 Geo. 4, and 1 Will. 4, c. 68 (commonly known as 'The General Carriers Act, 1830')" said, in 1830 an Act of Parliament was passed to put an end to certain evils of which carriers then complained. At that time there were no railways in operation, and all carriers did their business by horse-power. Stage coach proprietors, and other carriers, found that they could not protect themselves against losses from pilfering by loiterers and thieves, and they were driven to give public notices that they would not be liable for valuable parcels, such as bankers' packages, unless special intimation as to the nature and value of the parcel were given. The validity and the effect of those notices gave rise to litigation; and, to prevent this, the Carriers Act was passed. That Bill was introduced on the 25th May, and it became law on the 23rd July in the same year. The Bill was brought in by a private Member (Sir Thomas Acland), and was not founded on a Report of a Committee, or on the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown. Under it some 23 articles of the more costly descriptions, such as gold and silver, watches, silks, furs, &c., were placed in a separate category, and carriers were relieved from liability for their loss, unless the sender had first declared the nature of the property and paid a sum for insurance, while they were expressly made liable for the loss of all other goods, notwithstanding notice to the contrary. The Act, however, provided that the Common Law liability of the carriers for loss should only be retained where felony on the part of their servants was proved. That Act had not worked well, for the rates of insurance charged and the regulations made were of a prohibitive character. In consequence, great loss ensued to the trade, and especially in the case of Coventry, where the two staple trades were the silk and watch manufactures. The loss in transit of watches during the last 15 months was really formidable, and even the provision that the Company should be liable for the proved felony of their servants had worked very badly, for the subordinate railway officers could not be found to prove a state of facts which would render their employers liable. Further, the Act did not operate fairly towards Railway Companies, which were sometimes unduly exposed to great loss for want of proper care on the part of persons who sent goods in an insecure state. In 1868 the Government of the present Prime Minister actually attempted to deal with that question, admitting that a change in the law was necessary, and he hoped, therefore, his Motion would now be acceded to.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY said, the Act of 1830 was clearly not adapted to the existing state of things as regarded either railways or trades. Not only the system of carrying, but also the nature of a large portion of the goods conveyed, had entirely changed in the interval, and an alteration of the law had become necessary. The hon. and learned Gentleman had pointed out where the law was inapplicable, unfair, and incomplete, and in many points he (Sir Charles Adderley) agreed that it required revision and alteration to bring it into harmony with the present circumstances of the country. He not only assented to the Motion on the part of the Government, but he thought that the inquiry should take place as soon as possible, and the Government would afford every facility to the hon. and learned Gentleman for that purpose.

MR. STAVELEY HILL quite agreed with what had been said by his hon. and learned Friend. He (Mr. Staveley Hill) had prepared a Bill on the subject, which he would have asked leave to introduce. However, as his hon. and learned Friend had moved for a Committee, and the Government had assented to its appointment, he would simply express a hope that no question with reference to the rate of insurance would be raised, as he thought it would prevent the Committee from coming to an early conclusion on the subject.

Motion agreed to.

Select Committee appointed, "to inquire into the operation of the Act 11 Geo. 4, and 1 Will 4, c. 68 (commonly known as 'The General Carriers Act, 1830')."—(Mr. Jackson.)

And, on March 5, Committee nominated as follows:—MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK, MR. BROCKLEHURST, MR. MAURICE BROOKS, MR. BRUCE, MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, MR. FRESHFIELD, MR. GIBSON, MR. GOLDNEY, MR. STAVELEY HILL, MR. LAING, MR. LEBMAN, MR. SAMPSON LLOYD, MR. MAJENDIE, MR. MORLEY, MR. PEMBERTON,

MR. SALT, SIR EDWARD WATKIN, MR. WATKIN WILLIAMS, and MR. JACKSON:—Power to send for persons, papers, and records; Five to be the quorum.

BOROUGH AND POPULOUS PLACES (SCOTLAND) GAS SUPPLY BILL.

On Motion of Sir WYNDHAM ANSTRUTHER, Bill to enable towns and populous places in Scotland, being burghs under "The General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862," to erect Gasworks for the supply of Gas to such towns and populous places, or to acquire existing Gasworks therein, ordered to be brought in by Sir WYNDHAM ANSTRUTHER, MR. ORR EWING, MR. GRIEVE, and MR. WILLIAM HOLMS.

TURNPIKE ACTS CONTINUANCE.

Select Committee appointed, "to inquire into the Seventh Schedule of 'The Annual Turnpike Acts Continuance Act, 1874.'"—Lord GEORGE CAVENDISH, Lord HENRY THYNNE, MR. BEACH, MR. BEAUMONT, MR. M'LAGAN, MR. WILBRAHAM EGERTON, MR. WELBY, Sir HARCOURT JOHNSTONE, and MR. CLARE READ:—Power to send for persons, papers, and records; Three to be the quorum.

Instruction to the Committee that they have power to inquire and report to the House under what conditions, with reference to the rate of interest, expenses of management, maintenance of road, payment of debt, and term of years, or other special arrangements the Acts of the Trusts mentioned should be continued.—(Mr. Sclater-Booth.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading, read.

MR. LOPES, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that the object of the measure was to remove certain defects in the Bills of Sale Act (1854), the Preamble of which said that frauds were largely committed upon creditors by secret bills of sale of personal chattels, whereby persons were enabled to keep up the appearance of being in good circumstances and possessed of personal property; while the holders of such bills of sale could take that pro-societies in the Kingdom. He thought the 3rd section would require amendment, and he reserved to himself the right of opposing that clause in Committee.

MR. FORSYTH supported the second reading, but indicated certain defects in the wording of the Bill which would have to be amended in Committee.

Motion agreed to.

(Mr. Mulholland, Mr. Bruen, Viscount Crichton.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. MULHOLLAND, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, it was unnecessary for him to occupy the attention of the House by any elaborate statement. For many years past it had been the policy of Parliament to extend the term for which leases for ecclesiastical purposes might be granted, when it was shown that such extension would be for the public good. Powers had been given to the Court of Chancery in Ireland, and subsequently to the Landed Estates Court, to grant long leases in cases where they were required; and in 1855 an Act was passed for Ireland to enable limited owners to grant leases for religious purposes. The Preamble of that Act stated that great difficulties had arisen in providing sites for places for public worship, and it was therefore desirable that the facilities contained in the Act should be given. In the Act, the Established Church was excluded; but it was never contemplated by the Act that the Established Church should be put in any worse position than the other Churches in Ireland. But the fact was, that at that time the Established Church enjoyed exceptional advantages under Acts of its own; but in order to maintain those advantages, it was necessary for it to have a corporate existence, and having lost that under the Irish Church Act of 1869, the Disestablished Church was now, in this respect, in an exceptional position. The principle of the Act of 1869 was to put all Churches in Ireland on a perfect equality; but the Church of Ireland was now in a worse position than the other Churches. The Bill he now moved should be read a second time consisted really of but one essential clause—namely, to admit the Disestablished Church in Ireland to the principles contained in the Act of 1855. Under the re-construction of the Irish Church it had been found necessary in some instances to amalgamate the parishes, and it was sometimes found that the glebe which was most convenient for the old parish was most inconvenient for the new. In other cases it was found that the old glebe-houses were too large to be kept up on the reduced incomes, and that they could be sold at high prices if for new ones sites could be found. He could not see on what grounds there could be any opposition to the Bill, and he did not think that there could exist any objection to admit the Disestablished Church to the benefits of the Act of 1855. In 1853 a similar Act was passed for England in which the Established Church was not excluded. The hon. Member concluded by moving the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Mulholland.)

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, he did not object to the Bill, but only regretted that it did not go further than the Act of 1855, which did not allow limited owners to give leases for more than five acres for the purposes of glebes. He should like to see the limit extended to at least 15 acres, and he should also be glad if small quantities of land—say, to the extent of half-an-acre—could be granted at a peppercorn rent, instead of at the best market value, when such land was required for Church purposes. He hoped that the Act passed in 1870 enabling the Board of Works in Ireland to make loans to religious bodies, which would expire in February next, would be renewed for another five years.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH said, his attention had already been directed to the Act of 1870, referred to by the last speaker, and it would probably be his duty to bring that subject before the House this Session. As to the Bill now before them, he understood its principle to be merely the extension to the Disestablished Church in Ireland of a power now given by law to other religious bodies in that country. When the Act of 1855 passed, it was not made the day after Christmas Day, and the work done was so small, that it was clear the trade did not require the Custom House to be kept open. The fact that it was kept open occasioned heart-burnings among the employés through some being excused and others not; and it involved the attendance of a large number of persons at the places of business of shipbrokers, of ship-store dealers, and of many merchants, as well as at the docks and bonding warehouses, to receive goods that were not sent, and give out goods that were not applied for. The Superintendent of the largest dock in London said there was nothing done on Bank holidays now. The East and West India Docks, which have a daily average of 102 vessels working, were reduced to 25, and a daily average of 472 deliveries and receipts was reduced to 27, while not a single vessel left on the last Bank holiday. In the bonding warehouses 42 bills were paid, as against a daily average of 1,050; 122 documents were issued, as against a daily average of 2,820; and the number of persons who called to transact the business was 64, as against a daily average of 2,280. The amount of business done was clearly insufficient to warrant the bringing down of such a large number of employés. It had been said that in substituting these holidays in the way he proposed, a large number of labourers would be deprived of the means of earning their wages upon these four days. Still, the House might not be aware of what in the docks there were two classes of labourers—the permanent staff, who would not suffer, and those who were employed casually as they were needed; many of the latter, in consequence of the time they were employed in the docks being so short, had other employments which they carried on at home, and when the holidays came, if they were anxious to work and not wish to avail themselves of the holidays, they would occupy themselves in the ordinary way at home. It must be recollected that with the docks as at present on the Bank holidays, one-fourth of the average number of labourers were employed; while if they did not work on that day, they would make overtime on the following day, so that the total loss to them was not apparent than real. But even if a labourer were to lose 2s. 6d., that would be no argument against thousands of persons being allowed the opportunity of enjoying the holidays. With reference to the necessity for having some one at the docks to attend to certain Continental vessels which it was necessary to unload and load quickly, he could dispose of the objection by pointing out that in the case of a foreign vessel requiring to be looked after on one of the four days, a special application to one of the authorities such as was at present made in the case of public holidays, as the Queen's birthday, for instance, would always insure the attendance of a sufficient number of men to do the necessary work, and the expense would be but trifling. The Bill was supported by almost all the large owners of ships and steam vessels. The Liverpool owners were in favour of it, and he had inquired of the Cunard line, the White Star line, the Pacific line, and others, and the reply he had received was in the highest degree satisfactory. It was said that consignees would be deprived of one day for applying for their goods; but, in point of fact, there would be no interference with the time it would take to unload a vessel, for vessels were always unloaded more quickly than was required by their charter-party. The measure, no doubt, appeared somewhat stringent and likely to prevent any work being done on these holidays at the docks; but it was not his intention to prevent that, but to enable the same amount of work to be done on these days as was at present carried on on Christmas Day and Good Friday; but in order to make the measure more definite he would add, in Committee, the following Amendment to the 1st clause:—

“That nothing herein contained shall prevent the performance of such work or services in any dock or docks as may be deemed expedient by the directors of such dock or docks for the convenience of the shipping.”

That Amendment would remove any fears as to the jeopardizing of shipping in the Humber, or the delay of vessels which made short and frequent voyages to and from Hull—fears which had been expressed in a Petition from that port. The Petitioners had endeavoured to secure the assistance of some of the London docks in their opposition to the Bill, but had failed to do so. The directors of the East and West India Docks approved the Bill and hoped it would

necessary to have coal in trucks ready at particular times, and the inevitable effect of this legislation would be to stop the labour, not only of the dock men, but there would not be any empty trucks to send back to the mines; so that during all the next day the men employed in the collieries, who earned much higher wages than the dock labourers, would have to undergo a forced state of idleness. He spoke on behalf of 40,000 men employed in the Durham collieries, who did not wish to be so treated, especially as by an arrangement among themselves they already took a holiday every alternate Saturday. He called especial attention to the fact that the name of the hon. Baronet the Member for Maidstone (Sir John Lubbock) was not upon the back of the Bill—a signification that he did not consider the case of these men and that of the bank clerks the same, for the latter received their salaries during holidays. The Bill would be a mischief rather than an advantage to those who would be affected by it. In many parts of the North, the labouring population being able to take a holiday when they pleased, had run holiday mad, and he feared the tendency of the Bill would be to increase the evil.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word “now,” and at the end of the Question to add the words “upon this day six months.”—(Mr. Wilson.)

MR. WHEELHOUSE said, the hon. Member who moved the rejection of the Bill seemed to be under the impression that London, and London alone, was the particular district for which legislation was practically asked. He begged to say—notwithstanding the hon. Member for Hull (Mr. Wilson) had pointed out that there was no name belonging to the North-eastern ports behind the Bill, that his (Mr. Wheelhouse's) name was there, and he claimed to know somewhat of the feeling of the North-eastern ports in regard to this question. As far as concerned railway directors and dock proprietors, it might perfectly suit those gentlemen to consider that they alone had the interest of the parties who would be affected by the Bill at heart; but there were two stand-points from which the question could be viewed—one the workman's position—if he might say so — and the other that of railway directors and dock companies. He could state, however much the latter bodies opposed the measure, the working classes looked with great favour upon it. He denied the allegation that they had gone holiday mad; and so far as the argument of the hon. Member for York (Mr. Leeman) was concerned, with respect to the enforced idleness of the colliers by reason of the waggons not being sent back from the docks the day after the holiday, if there was any force in it, it would apply equally to every Monday in the year. But they all knew that on those days the 40,000 men on whose behalf the hon. Gentleman had spoken were busily employed. As regarded the clerks employed in the Government Departments, he knew that in the borough of Leeds, where there was a very large amount of duty paid, the clerks employed in the Inland Revenue Office had nothing whatever to do on the Bank holidays. If there was ever a strong and reasonable Bill which under the circumstances did not in any way interfere with the trade of the country, it was the Bill before the House, and he hoped his hon. Friend would succeed in passing it.

MR. STEVENSON, in opposing the Bill, said, he had no objection to the further carrying out of the great principles laid down by the Bank Holidays Act; but if the Bill had any meaning at all, it would introduce an entirely new principle which had not been introduced into legislation before. By the Bank Holidays Act, bills falling due on the holidays were made payable the day after, and so the banker did not require the attendance of his clerks; but he was not aware that that Act compelled a banker to close his doors. He thought that, without any legislation whatever on the subject, the object desired by the hon. Member was in fact actually taking place, so far as it could be accomplished, by the voluntary consent of the parties interested, and there was no desire on the part of the working classes for a measure of this kind, who would lose their day's pay by the enforced holiday. To the compulsory extension of its provisions he altogether objected. Besides, he failed to see how the Bill would work on the River Tyne, providing, as it did, for a “close holiday” inside the docks, while work might go on on the character that it would be necessary to secure that full liberty should be reserved for the carrying on of trade on these days without check or hindrance. Neither the Treasury nor the Custom House authorities wished public servants to be on duty when there was no work to be done; but, at the same time, they were anxious that the most complete opportunity should be allowed under the Bill for the carrying on of trade generally. A Return which he had received from the Customs of the number of entries, &c., taken at London on the four Bank holidays of last year, showed the following results:—April 6—Entries, 31; number of vessels reported, 41; number of bonds, 36; amount of duty received, £119 6s. 3d. May 25—Entries, 28; vessels reported, 29; bonds, 48; duty, £154 16s. August 3—Entries, 40; vessels reported, 88; bonds, 42; duty, £594 9s. 2d. December 26—Entries, 22; vessels reported, 30; bonds, 18; duty, £211 1s. 6d. On an ordinary day the average number of entries was 3,163; bonds, 221; and duty, £36,628. [Mr. NORWOOD asked, whether there was a similar Return from the out-ports?] He had not obtained the statistics from other ports; but if the hon. Member wished it, there would be no objection to supply them at a future stage of the Bill. From those figures it appeared to those concerned in the government of the Customs that they were bringing down a large number of persons to the Customs and docks on days when there was really a very small amount of work to be done, but they had no power to relieve them of that attendance except by Act of Parliament. The question had also been referred to the Inland Revenue Commissioners, and their answer was, that they had no objection to the provisions of the present Bill being extended to their Department. The last thing the Government would propose would be to suspend business on any day on which it was ordinarily transacted; but the fact was, the Bank Holidays Act appeared to have put a stop to ordinary business to a great extent, and it was represented to the Government that it was vexatious and unnecessary to require gentlemen to sit in offices where no work was to be done. So far as the Government offices were concerned, therefore, the Bill, as he had remarked, was unobjectionable, but it would certainly be necessary to provide against any such interruption of trade as hon. Members had indicated. He ventured to say that without that provision, the Bill would not pass, and he suggested that if the House would allow the Bill to be read a second time that day, the Committee should be fixed for a late date, in order that representations might be made from all the interests affected, and that ample time should be afforded for the introduction of Amendments. He was not certain that it might not be possible to omit docks from the Bill altogether, but he refrained from expressing any opinion on this point, because he did not know how far the attendance of the Custom House officers at docks was necessary. [Mr. NORWOOD: How about the Ferriers' holiday?] That was an ancient right, and he did not think that he could propose to touch the right without exciting an amount of popular feeling, which he did not wish to excite. He trusted that the House would understand that he was not arguing in favour of a new holiday, and he thought there was a great deal of force in the argument which had fallen from hon. Gentlemen in reference to that matter. All he was arguing for was that, a holiday already existing, a large number of persons should not be compelled to attend in an empty room, where there was no work of any kind to be undertaken.

Mr. PALMER said, that the whole course of the debate showed that the Bank Holiday's Act ought to be confined to London alone, and so far he fully sympathised with the Bill. The hon. Member for York (Mr. Leeman) had certainly neither exaggerated nor overstated the case when he said that if the Bill was extended to the case of the docks it would have the effect of totally suspending the business of the whole district. If docks were closed in any of the ports throughout the North of England, it would have the effect of closing the railways, the collieries, and most of the manufacturing establishments throughout the North. They had, therefore, not only to consider the loss that would be inflicted on the employers and the employed, but the loss that would be caused to the whole district. He believed that the Bill did not receive the approval of the working men as a body, especially in the North, for the loss that was already occasioned in that part of the country by the number of holidays was already excessive, and they were now asked by legislation to make a large and material increase to it. He should therefore support the Amendment, because he knew that the Bill would inflict considerable loss on the employers and the employed, besides greatly injuring the trade generally of the North of England.

Mr. TORR thought the view of the last speaker an exaggerated one. His experience of commercial life in the seaports was as extensive as that of the hon. Member for North Durham (Mr. Palmer), and as the result of his experience, he was convinced that the adoption of the principle of the Bill would involve no suspension of trade whatever. If it was thought that inconvenience or possible loss would result from including docks in the provisions of the Bill, it would be easy to propose their omission when the Bill got into Committee. When the Bank Holidays Act was passed, it struck him as being invidious to make a selection from the different classes of public servants who should be the recipients of the boon, and after the thoroughly liberal and equitable explanation which had been made by the Secretary to the Treasury of the views of the Government, he should support the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. RODWELL said, it might seem invidious to oppose a Bill which provided for the recreation of the people, but he had been very much struck by the arguments of those hon. Gentlemen who held that the measure would interfere with private enterprise, and would be introducing a new and very dangerous principle. He believed that that difficulty had arisen because the Bill was, to some extent, a departure from the principle of the Bank Holidays Act. The object of that Act was to give certain holidays to salaried clerks and others who were not paid by the day; but this Bill did not adhere to that principle, and that was the great difference between it and the Act of 1871. If the docks were excluded from the operation of the Bill, the great objection to it would be withdrawn. It would, however, be a dangerous precedent if the House tried to provide holidays for day labourers, and might lead to applications from railway labourers, colliers, and men engaged in other great industrial interests. If the Bill was not made applicable to docks, he did not see any great objection to it, but unless they were to be excluded, he would vote against it.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, that although objection had been taken to the fact that the names of Representatives of the great seaports were not to be found on the back of the Bill, one of the hon. Members for Liverpool had expressed himself in favour of the principle involved. The reason for his name being found among those of the hon. Members who prepared and brought in the measure was, that he was the first to introduce the question of Bank holidays to the House, the principle of his Bill having been sanctioned by a Committee of which he was Chairman. Speaking personally, he was of opinion that the Bank Holidays Act of 1871 did not go far enough. He would, for instance, have preferred to see included in its provisions the employés in the Savings Banks department of the Post Office, and also that the holidays in the Law Courts should have been arranged for the days prescribed by the Act.

MR. RITCHIE, in reply, said, he should be glad to accede to the suggestion of the Government, and put the Committee down for a distant day. When the Bill reached that stage, if the Government considered it necessary and if it was the wish of the House, he should have no objection to exclude docks from the operation of the Bill. He trusted that course would obviate any opposition to the measure.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, 25th February, 1875.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILL—Second Reading—Referred to Select Committee—Church Patronage (12).

Mr. Rodwell

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE BISHOP OF PETERBOROUGH: My Lords, the Bill to which I am about to ask your Lordships to grant a second reading to-night is an attempt to give legal effect to the recommendations of the Select Committee which your Lordships were pleased to appoint on my Motion last year to inquire into the subject of Church Patronage: and I may state at the outset that the Bill neither goes beyond, nor falls short of the recommendations of that Committee. It simply embodies the recommendations of the Select Committee of your Lordships' House on this subject. And, my Lords, if you have looked at the Report and the recommendations of that Committee, you will have observed that, while the Committee has been a large, and, I may venture to say, a remarkably representative Committee, its recommendations are, almost without exception, unanimous. There were only four divisions in the Committee, and two of these only were what might be called very close or narrow divisions. I may say, therefore, that the Bill comes before your Lordships with the almost unanimous recommendation of the Committee. It also comes before you with the almost unanimous consensus of the very competent and able witnesses examined before the Committee. It has, further, the advantage of representing the views of two Committees of the Upper and the Lower Houses of Convocation; and I think I may venture to say also that it represents, in the main, the wishes and opinions of nearly all my right rev. Brethren of the Episcopacy. Therefore, my Lords, I believe I may say that I come before you not only with my own opinion, but having that accompanied by very important and intelligent opinion on the subject. My Lords, in the first place, I think I may claim that the evidence taken by the Committee, and the Report drawn up by the Committee, do affirm the necessity for some legislation on this subject; for your Lordships' Committee distinctly states that there are serious and practical evils connected with the present system of Church Patronage, and that the existing provisions of the law on this subject are very insufficient and demand a remedy. So far, therefore, the necessity for legislation in this matter is made out.

Before, however, I proceed to explain the details of the Bill, which is mainly one of details, I have to say a few words as to the principle of the measure; and I do not think I can state what that principle is better than it is thus stated in the first paragraph of the Report of the Select Committee, which is in these terms—

“As regards the first of these questions, the Committee are of opinion that all legislation affecting Church Patronage should proceed upon the principle that such patronage partakes of the nature of a trust to be exercised for the spiritual benefit of the parishioners, and that whatever rights of property originally attached, or in process of time have attached, to patronage, must always be regarded with reference to the application of this principle. All exercise of the rights of patronage without due regard to the interests of the parishioners, should, so far as possible, be restrained by law; and the law should also aim at imposing such checks on the exercise of his choice by the patron as should prevent, as far as possible, the appointment of unfit persons to the cure of souls.”

My Lords, this is the principle of this Bill—that patronage is not merely and not mainly property—that it is a trust; and that if it be property, so far as it is property, “it has its duties as well as its rights,” and that every patron is to be regarded as exercising a most solemn and important trust in behalf of the parishioners. In one word, the object of all legislation in respect of patronage is to secure that we shall have—not, perhaps, the best possible man, but, at all events, a good and fitting man—as the minister to whom is given the government and cure of souls. It is quite clear that if you recognize that patronage is a trust, this trust may be violated in one of two ways. It may be violated, in the first place, by an unfit appointment on the part of a corrupt patron; or, in the second place, it may be violated by an unfit appointment on the part of a careless patron. The object of legislation on this subject, therefore, is to prevent a corrupt exercise of patronage, and also to prevent a careless exercise of patronage. The law of the land has always set itself against corrupt practices—that is, against the passing of money between the patron and the presentee—against the purchase of a high and sacred office for money or money's worth. The law, however, goes further, and has attempted to prevent abuse not merely in the exercise of patronage, but in the transfer of the right of patronage—that is, in the sale of advowsons or of next presentations. So that the policy of the law is not to favour corrupt patrons. Admitting for a moment, what I am not prepared to concede absolutely, that the sale of the right to exercise patronage is ever advisable, the Legislature interferes with the exercise of this right, and says that it shall not be exercised under circumstances that give undue facilities for corruption. In the next place, the law of patronage requires that there shall be fitness on the part of the presentee—that there shall be some guarantee of the fit exercise of the patronage. In order to secure this, the patron himself does not appoint, but presents his nominee to the Bishop, who is the judge of his fitness. The law on this subject, therefore, resolves itself into this—a recognition of the patron's right, but provision on the one hand against a corrupt exercise or a corrupt transfer of that right; and in the next place, provision for the appointment of good and fit men under the system of patronage; and, in the third place—and to this I ask the especial attention of your Lordships—recognition by the law of the Church and the law of the land that the Bishop is the proper person to see that the patronage is duly exercised. This latter recognition makes the Bishop the guardian of the trust as regards the parishioners; what the Bishop has to regard, before God, being the fitness of the presentee and the right of the parishioners to have a good pastor. But, my Lords, I submit this Bill to your consideration, because, in respect of each of these three things, the present state of law is defective, and needs amendment.

My Lords, I may say before I go into the details of this measure, that the object of it is not merely and not mainly to prevent the improper exercise of patronage by private patrons—your Lordships will see that its details deal very largely with public patrons. Its object is not to single out private patrons as if they were especially corrupt and especially unwise, but to require a proper exercise of patronage, whether by private or by public patrons.

[If the Bill was not made ap- docks, he did not see any tion to it, but unless they excluded, he would vote

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Read- ing, read.

THE BISHOP OF PETERBOROUGH: My Lords, the Bill to which I am about to ask your Lordships to grant a second reading to-night is an attempt to give legal effect to the recommendations of the Select Committee which your Lordships were pleased to appoint on my Motion last year to inquire into the sub- ject of Church Patronage: and I may state at the outset that the Bill neither goes beyond, nor falls short of the re- commendations of that Committee. It simply embodies the recommendations of the Select Committee of your Lordships' House on this subject. And, my Lords, if you have looked at the Report and the recommendations of that Committee, you will have observed that, while the Committee has been a large, and, I may venture to say, a remarkably re- presentative Committee, its recommend- ations are, almost without exception, unanimous. There were only four divi- sions in the Committee, and two of these only were what might be called very close or narrow divisions. I may say, therefore, that the Bill comes before your Lordships with the almost unanimous recommenda- tion of the Committee. It also comes before you with the almost unanimous consensus of the very competent and able witnesses examined before the Commit- tee. It has, further, the advantage of representing the views of two Commit- tees of the Upper and the Lower Houses of Convocation; and I think I may ven- ture to say also that it represents, in the main, the wishes and opinions of nearly all my right rev. Brethren of the Episco- pacy. Therefore, my Lords, I believe I may say that I come before you not only with my own opinion, but having that accompanied by very important and intelligent opinion on the subject. My Lords, in the first place, I think I may claim that the evidence taken by the Committee, and the Report drawn up by the Committee, do affirm the necessity for some legislation on this subject; for your Lordships' Committee distinctly states that there are serious and practical evils connected with the present system of Church Patronage, and that the existing provisions of the law on this subject are very insufficient and demand a remedy. So far, therefore, the necessity for legislation in this matter is made out.

Before, however, I proceed to explain the details of the Bill, which is mainly one of details, I have to say a few words as to the principle of the measure; and I do not think I can state what that principle is better than it is thus stated in the first paragraph of the Report of the Select Committee, which is in these terms—

“As regards the first of these questions, the Committee are of opinion that all legislation affecting Church Patronage should proceed upon the principle that such patronage partakes of the nature of a trust to be exercised for the spiritual benefit of the parishioners, and that whatever rights of property originally attached, or in process of time have attached, to patronage, must always be regarded with reference to the application of this principle. All exercise of the rights of patronage without due regard to the interests of the parishioners, should, so far as possible, be restrained by law; and the law should also aim at imposing such checks on the exercise of his choice by the patron as should prevent, as far as possible, the appointment of unfit persons to the cure of souls.”

My Lords, this is the principle of this Bill—that patronage is not merely and not mainly property—that it is a trust; and that if it be property, so far as it is property, “it has its duties as well as its rights,” and that every patron is to be regarded as exercising a most solemn and important trust in behalf of the parishioners. In one word, the object of all legislation in respect of patronage is to secure that we shall have—not, perhaps, the best possible man, but, at all events, a good and fitting man—as the minister to whom is given the government and cure of souls. It is quite clear that if you recognize that patronage is a trust, this trust may be violated in one of two ways. It may be violated, in the first place, by an unfit appointment on the part of a corrupt patron; or, in the second place, it may be violated by an unfit appointment on the part of a careless patron. The object of legislation on this subject, therefore, is to prevent a corrupt exercise of patronage, and also to prevent a careless exercise of patronage. The law of the land has always set itself against corrupt practices—that is, against the passing of money between the patron and the presentee—against the purchase of a high and sacred office for money or money's worth. The law, however, goes further, and has attempted to prevent abuse not merely in the exercise of patronage, but in the transfer of the right of patronage—that is, in the sale of advowsons or of next presentations. So that the policy of the law is not to favour corrupt patrons. Admitting for a moment, what I am not prepared to concede absolutely, that the sale of the right to exercise patronage is ever advisable, the Legislature interferes with the exercise of this right, and says that it shall not be exercised under circumstances that give undue facilities for corruption. In the next place, the law of patronage requires that there shall be fitness on the part of the presentee—that there shall be some guarantee of the fit exercise of the patronage. In order to secure this, the patron himself does not appoint, but presents his nominee to the Bishop, who is the judge of his fitness. The law on this subject, therefore, resolves itself into this—a recognition of the patron's right, but provision on the one hand against a corrupt exercise or a corrupt transfer of that right; and in the next place, provision for the appointment of good and fit men under the system of patronage; and, in the third place—and to this I ask the especial attention of your Lordships—recognition by the law of the Church and the law of the land that the Bishop is the proper person to see that the patronage is duly exercised. This latter recognition makes the Bishop the guardian of the trust as regards the parishioners; what the Bishop has to regard, before God, being the fitness of the presentee and the right of the parishioners to have a good pastor. But, my Lords, I submit this Bill to your consideration, because, in respect of each of these three things, the present state of law is defective, and needs amendment.

My Lords, I may say before I go into the details of this measure, that the object of it is not merely and not mainly to prevent the improper exercise of patronage by private patrons—your Lordships will see that its details deal very largely with public patrons. Its object is not to single out private patrons as if they were especially corrupt and especially unwise, but to require a proper exercise of patronage, whether by private or by public patrons.

extravagant gift. I think it right to say that on this first provision in the clause I did not carry a very large majority of the Committee with me; but on the latter provision—that referring to clergymen over 70—the case was different. It is a provision aimed against those persons who, knowing well what they are doing, deliberately choose the very oldest or most decrepit man they can find for an incumbency in order that they may be able to sell the living over his head. I hope that when addressing your Lordships on the subject last year I did not use very strong language, and I have avoided doing so on this occasion also; but I cannot refrain from branding this putting in of an unfit man—this knowingly appointing an unfit man to a cure of souls—as a deliberate iniquity. I say there are men now serving their term of penal servitude for fraud and conspiracy who are guilty of less deliberate fraud and less odious conspiracy than the fraud and conspiracy of those patrons who thus make a corrupt merchandise of the cure of souls—of the clergyman who makes a merchandise of his known infirmities and feebleness, and the avaricious and conscienceless patron who thrusts him upon parishioners who hate and detest him, knowing that they have been sold for so many pieces of silver. This, I say, is a practice which makes the Church stink in the nostrils of many who might otherwise come within her fold. An incumbent, aged 75 years, came to myself within six weeks after his appointment, and asked me for perpetual leave of absence on the ground of age. The only consolation I had in connection with a transaction of the kind was that I refused the application. I ask in the 9th clause of the Bill that the Bishop may have power to refuse to institute a presentee on the ground that—

“he is, in the opinion of the Bishop, unable from bodily infirmity to perform adequately the duties of the benefice to which he has been presented.”

I think there is necessity for such a clause, because I am advised that at present a Bishop would actually have no power to refuse to institute a man on the ground of the candidate being paralyzed. But I ask your Lordships to observe that in this, as in every other case of refusal to institute by the Bishop, this Bill gives him no veto—it only gives him power to object, subject to the decision of a Court of Law.

My Lords, I now come to a very important clause in the Bill which introduces a principle to some extent new. It is Clause 11, which provides that any three or more parishioners may, within a period limited in the clause, enter a caveat to the institution of the presentee. I do not see why what would be an impediment to a man's ordination should not be an impediment to his institution to a cure of souls; and neither can I see why objections to a man's institution should not be made in an open manner and duly investigated in the presence of the parties. At present a Bishop sometimes receives a private letter, in which it is stated—“We know So-and-so to be unfitted, but we trust you will not mention our names in the matter.” The Bishop knows that there is no use in objecting, because the writers will not come forward, and reluctantly, institutes the clergyman. Then a letter appears in the newspapers, asking “What is the use of a Bishop?” I ask in fairness to the Bishop—I ask in fairness to the incumbent—that scandal should not be spread about in this way; but that there may be a mode by which persons who have anything to allege against the clergyman may bring it forward and have an investigation. I ask this also on the ground that it will be held in terrorem over the heads of those who would attempt the appointment of unfit persons. I ask it, further, in order that parishioners may feel that they are not sold—that we may not hear of parishioners saying—“Who bought us? We hope he is a good man, but we have no power to object.” By Clause 19 of the Bill I propose that every patron on presenting a nominee shall make a declaration similar to that which is to be made by the presentee against simoniacal transactions. Why should it be regarded as an indignity to the patron if it is not so regarded in respect of the clergy? And I do not think anyone concerned in the appointment of a clergyman to the cure of souls should object to give every reasonable guarantee for a proper discharge of his share in the matter. In these days, when appointments made by the Episcopacy are so much scrutinized, I should be only too happy of an opportunity of vindicating before the parishioners any appointment I might make.

The Bishop of Peterborough

In Clause 20, your Lordships will observe a very important alteration is proposed in the existing law. The declaration against simony is to be abolished. That declaration is simply preposterous. It asks a man to declare that he has not committed simony, and it punishes him if he does commit it; but it does not tell him what it is—the declaration leaves him to find that out by the light of his own conscience or by the assistance of his lawyer. I ask that you shall forbid, not the name of the thing, but the thing itself. I ask that the patron and the clergyman shall declare—not that they have not committed simony, but that they have not done so and so which is forbidden by law. In the 22nd section provision is made for the punishment of those who aid and abet in a simoniacal transaction. The object of this is that the heavy hand of the law may be laid on those men who make money by a corrupt trafficking in Church patronage. To my certain knowledge honest and conscientious clergymen have been inveigled into simoniacal transactions by these men, and have not discovered the nature of the negotiations until they were already drawn on too far to retreat. By the 24th section I ask that all deeds or agreements relating to the advowson of a benefice shall be duly registered. If your Lordships were only aware of the number of “confidential” circulars sent to clergymen by these benefice-mongers you would at once see the necessity for this clause. These traffickers in Church livings state that their communications are “strictly confidential;” that “every reliance may be placed on the secrecy” of the negotiations, &c. I can compare their circulars with none others but those sent to young officers by money lenders. If livings are to be sold like horses, let the sale of them be as public as that of horses, and I only wish there could be a warranty for the honesty of the vendors. If your Lordships look to the 25th and 26th clauses, you will find provisions for preventing evasions of the Statute of Queen Anne. By these clauses payment of interest on the purchase-money of an advowson will be illegal. In the Select Committee cases were mentioned of incumbents who are also patrons of their own livings, and who sell their advowsons with an understanding or a contract that they will pay interest for the money to the purchasers until they are void with a view to their own resignation as soon as they think convenient. I object to that. It is as wrong to buy a pastorate as it is to buy a judgeship. A man ought not to be allowed to buy a high and solemn office. It may be said that he does not buy the office, but only the right of presentation to it. I do not wish to introduce the ludicrous into a discussion of this matter; but the case seems to me like that of a man who buys a house with a solemn promise that he will not allow any one into a certain room in that house. He keeps that promise, but he lets to any one who will pay for it the key which gives admission to the room. But I have heard it said—“Why should not a man buy a living as a doctor buys a country practice.” There is this difference—that you need not employ the doctor who buys the practice if you do not like; but you must employ the clergyman. You do not allow a medical man to purchase the post of surgeon to a regiment or to a ship. To prevent such abuses, Clause 26 of this Bill provides that the clerk purchasing an advowson shall not have the next presentation. I believe that is the only way of preventing these abuses under the present system; but I must say that my own conviction is that the axe never will be laid to the root of the evil till you entirely prohibit the sale of next presentations. There is, as I have before alleged, an essential difference between the sales of advowsons and that of next presentations. The patron who sells the advowson parts with the trust; but the patron who sells only the next presentation retains the trust with all its advantages and responsibilities, but sells to another the right of coming in and exercising that trust which he is bound to exercise himself. It may be asked, then, why I do not propose in this Bill to entirely prohibit the sale of the next presentation. My simple reason is that I was not so fortunate as to obtain the assent of your Lordships’ Select Committee to that proposition. On a division on this point there was a majority of one against me. I have no wish to conceal my disappointment; but I may mention that the division to which I allude was not taken in presence of the whole Committee. Members were absent who would have voted with me; but having moved for the Committee myself and having acted as its Chairman, I felt loyally bound not to propose anything in this Bill which the Committee did not recommend. Your Lordships can of course introduce this provision if you wish; and I may add that your Lordships will find from passages in the Report that the Committee was of opinion that certain recommendations introduced in this Bill were equivalents for such a prohibition, and that in the opinion of the Committee if those recommendations should fail, then the way would be open to further legislation in the way of preventing the sale of next presentations.

I trust your Lordships will be of opinion that I have brought forward no vague or crude or revolutionary measure. Certainly it has not been my wish to do so. I have studied this question as a painful study for more than two years, and in consideration of it I have been assisted by amateur legislators with some claim to a knowledge of the irregular and confused lines of our legislation on Church patronage. I believe it will be found that in this Bill the question is treated on a true and sound principle. I am afraid there will always be abuses in every system of patronage; because so long as you have men to give and men to receive you will always have to make a large allowance for the infirmities of human nature. Those who are dissatisfied with our Church patronage system are too apt to forget in the heat of their denunciation and vituperation what abuses might be likely to arise in any other system which might be substituted for it. I have no wish to substitute for the large and varied system that now exists any system of popular election. I am quite certain of this—that the Church of England, taken altogether, presents in her clergy a body of men who for integrity, piety, and a self-sacrificing discharge of the duties of their office may bear comparison with any clergy in the world. I cannot believe, therefore, that our system of patronage, however defective it may be in some respects, can be so thoroughly wrong, so thoroughly corrupt, as those who, viewing it from the outside, are pleased to say it is. I do not believe that the patrons in the Church of England and the clergy of the Church of England are that seething mass of corruption which some great persons describe them to be. I do not believe that, as a body, the patrons of livings are unscrupulous men. On the contrary, I believe that, as a rule, the Church patronage of this kingdom is exercised with a conscientious sense of the duties of their trust both by public and by private patrons, and that among the latter are many men who are not only conscientious, but generous and munificent patrons who have established a right to their patronage by large gifts to the Church. I say, therefore, my Lords, that I have no wish to abolish private patronage. Because I believe that private patronage is of immense value to the Church, and because I desire to preserve it from angry, revolutionary, and unjust assaults, I wish it to be fortified by reform in order that it may have a lasting lease of life. Therefore, in the interest not merely of the private patrons, but in the interest of the Church and of the nation, which I believe are in God's providence indissolubly bound up now as they have been in the past history of the country, I earnestly desire a wholesome, wise, moderate, and yet efficient reform of our system of Church patronage. It is for this reason that I ask your Lordships to give a second reading to the present Bill, which seems to me to be a step—and I trust that your Lordships will, at all events, regard it as an anxious and honest step—in the direction I have indicated.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
—(The Lord Bishop of Peterborough.)

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND: My Lords, I think it right to intimate at once the course which Her Majesty's Government deem it proper to pursue in reference to this Bill. It would be doing an injustice to the right rev. Prelate and to my own feelings towards him if I did not take the earliest opportunity of saying that this House and the country are greatly indebted to him for taking up this subject as he has done, for the manner in which he conducted the proceedings of the Committee of last year, and for the great service which he has done to the Church by bringing the matter under the consideration of your Lordships. No one can be blind to the fact that occurrences connected with the exercise of Church patronage have for some years caused considerable scandal, and it is only right and prudent that an attempt should be made to grapple with the evil. I will not now follow the right rev. Prelate into all the details which he has brought under the notice of your Lordships; but while agreeing with him in many of the points to which he has referred, and believing that it would be right and proper to accord a second reading to the Bill, I would venture to suggest to him, having read the clauses with great attention, that if the measure receives the sanction of your Lordships to-night by passing the second reading, it should then be referred to a Select Committee of your Lordships. I say this because I think that every one upon reading the Bill must admit that it is drawn in a manner which will render considerable correction necessary. The right rev. Prelate himself says that it is essentially a Bill of details—that it is a mass of details put together; and I venture to think these details would be better discussed and more easily set right by a Select Committee than by a Committee of the Whole House. There are parts of the Bill to which I will venture to call the attention of the right rev. Prelate, which I think will require very considerable discussion, and for the retention of which it will be necessary to give more reasons than at present appear. In the first place, I do not quite follow the right rev. Prelate in the reasons he gave for abolishing the present mode of dealing with the matter under consideration—namely, by Courts of Law. With regard to the Judge to whom the right rev. Prelate would transfer the jurisdiction, I can only speak, like him, in terms of the highest respect; but at the same time I do not think he has adduced sufficient arguments for altering the present mode of proceeding. Then, the clauses of the Bill are drawn at such length that when one has got to the end of a clause one has almost forgotten what was at the commencement of it; and for this reason also it is necessary that the Bill should be discussed in Committee. As to the 8th clause, it may be a question whether, at all events, a part of it should not be omitted. It requires that a presentee should send to the Bishop a testimonial, in a prescribed form, signed by three beneficed clergymen, and it gives the Bishop power to refuse to accept the testimonial if he thinks that any of the subscribers to it are not worthy of credit. Now, it does seem hard that a presentee who may be himself in every respect worthy should lose the living because one of the subscribers to his testimonial is in the opinion of the Bishop unworthy of credit. And how would the Bishop prove, if the matter came before a Judge, that the person was really unworthy of credit? It would be very hard both to the patron and the presentee if this power were given. Moreover, it is proposed that the Bishop should have power to refuse to institute a presentee if he thinks he is suffering from such bodily infirmity as would render him unable to discharge his duties. I do not mean to say that it might not be possible to indicate in a clause or Schedule what is to constitute bodily infirmity; but it seems to me that the patron and presentee would be put in a very false position if the provision remained as it stands. There is another clause—also one of considerable length—which appears to me to be of a very extraordinary character. There has been a good deal said, and more remains to be said, about “Exchanges” in the Army, but I think that Clause 23 of this Bill recognizes payments for exchange to a very much greater degree than can ever have been contemplated in connection with any service under Her Majesty. It provides that—

“From and after the commencement of this Act all exchanges of benefices between the incumbents thereof shall be made by the execution by such incumbents of a deed of exchange in the form prescribed in the rules and orders, and such deed may contain a covenant for the payment of a sum of money by either incumbent to the other, subject to such conditions as may be agreed on.”

So that a man who has a small living and a great deal of money, may get another man who has a large living and little money to exchange benefices with him in consideration of a payment of £5,000 or other large sum. Some proviso is necessary with the view of preventing abuses of the system of exchange. I repeat that, while agreeing to the second reading of the Bill we think it ought to be referred to a Select Committee, where the details to which I have alluded could be discussed more satisfactorily than in this House.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said, that no one could regret more than he did to find himself, even in appearance, the opponent of any proposal made by the right rev. Prelate for the objects which he had described so eloquently. That the subject was one well worthy their Lordships' consideration every one would admit. The Select Committee who considered this subject were at one as regarded the existence of the evils which had to be dealt with—evils which had been described by the right rev. Prelate in language no way exaggerated. But the Committee differed as to the means which ought to be adopted to mitigate those evils. There were two distinct lines on which they approached the subject. It was open to them to consider, first, whether any safe-guards might be devised against the abuses of the rights of patrons; and, secondly, whether those rights were not in themselves mischievous or excessive. Now, with regard to the former, it was unnecessary for him to recapitulate the different steps which under this Bill could be taken in order to prevent the corrupt or injurious exercise of the right of presentation. Their Lordships would see that the Bill tended to strengthen the hands of the Bishop by enabling him to resist an improper appointment; that it gave an important liberty to the parishioners to object to the person nominated; and that in various other ways it provided checks on the exercise of the right of patronage. All these were steps the importance of which could not be over-rated; and in addition to the good effects which might be anticipated from these provisions, the Bill would have a very beneficial operation in the attention it would attract to the abuses which had been referred to with such just indignation by the right rev. Prelate. The question which the Committee had had to decide was, whether, admitting that the steps proposed by the Bill ought to be taken, further steps ought to be taken also; whether, in addition to setting up safe-guards against the abusive exercise of the patron's rights, it was necessary to curtail those rights themselves. In considering this question, a distinction must be kept in view between the right of the sale of the next presentations and the right of the sale of advowsons. There was a remarkable unanimity of opinion among the witnesses before the Committee as to the imprudence of making any change with regard to the sale of advowsons. The result of the inquiry had, he believed, been to leave the system of private patronage, in so far as advowsons were concerned, more firmly established than ever. With regard, however, to the sale of next presentations, the case was not so clear. The right rev. Prelate, as their Lordships were aware, held a very decided view upon this subject; but the Committee had not adopted that view, and the right rev. Prelate had in consequence, when giving effect to the recommendations of the Committee, found himself precluded from embodying in the Bill the provision to which he himself attached most importance. His own feeling was opposed to the view of the right rev. Prelate, for he believed that if the law with regard to advowsons were to remain unchanged, it would be impolitic, at all events, for the present, to alter the law affecting next presentations. Was it true, as represented by the right rev. Prelate, that there was a distinction in principle between the rights of the patron in the two cases? It was contended, on one hand, that the right to sell the advowson necessarily included the right to sell the next presentation, on the ground that the whole must necessarily include the less—the right to sell the advowson being no more than the right to make several presentations in succession. It was said, on the other hand, that the advowson being in the nature of a trust, it was competent for a man to divest himself of the whole trust, but not of a part of it. Those arguments he would leave to be discussed by noble and learned Lords. His own view of the question was that, even supposing any difference in point of principle existed between the two rights, it was perfectly competent to the Legislature to deal with the sale of next presentations in a different manner from that in which they dealt with the sale of advowsons, if the one were found to give rise to evils which the other did not. There were, however, present to his mind three practical objections to the proposal of the right rev. Prelate. His first objection was on the ground of the expense which would be incurred in carrying it into effect. His second objection was that the proposal would not prove an effectual remedy for the abuses sought to be put an end to; and his third objection was that the remedy was, or, probably, might be, a needless one. With regard to the question of expense; it was not for him to say to what extent the patrons would be entitled to compensation, should their rights be thus curtailed; but he hoped that if it were necessary to compensate them the sum necessary, whether provided by the nation or out of the funds of the Church, would be liberally and cheerfully paid, in order to get rid of these scandalous practices. But his main objection to the proposal was that the remedy it offered would be ineffectual. Suppose that the sale of next presentations only were forbidden, the effect would be that the traffic in the sale of advowsons would be enormously stimulated;—and this view had been fully supported by the evidence which Mr. Dunn and Mr. Leigh had given before the Committee. Now, as the scandal attached to the idea of traffic, and not only to the idea of traffic of that particular kind with which the right rev. Prelate was anxious to deal, it would obviously not be suppressed, but only partially, if at all, mitigated by a limitation of the traffic in presentations if the traffic in advowsons were allowed to survive. The objection that the restriction proposed by the Bill was or might be needless was grounded on the fact that the other parts of the measure would enormously strengthen the power of the Bishop, and would give additional publicity to these objectionable transactions, which were now conducted under the shelter of secrecy and obscurity. It would, at all events, be prudent to try for a time the effect of the Bill as it stood, and not at once to pledge the country to a very cumbrous and possibly expensive mode of checking the evils complained of. He should be glad to see a fair trial given to the provisions of the Bill, and should they fail he should then gladly support a Bill as stringent and vigorous as this one was lenient in its operation.

THE BISHOP OF EXETER said, he thought it was the duty of those right rev. Prelates who had looked carefully into this subject to lay before their Lordships the various aspects of the question, as they were necessarily more acquainted with the facts than any other Members of this House. There were two distinct classes of lay patronage in the Church which were sufficiently distinct in their character and in their incidents. There was, in the first place, the class of private patronage, which was exercised personally by the patron.

He was convinced of the great advantage of private patronage so exercised, having witnessed the extreme care and conscientiousness with which lay patrons investigated the fitness of the clergymen whom they selected to fill the benefices at their disposal. Judging from what he had seen in his own benefice, he could say that nothing could be more advantageous than the relations which subsisted between the lay patrons and the clergymen so appointed, as it afforded a guarantee that all the parties would work together heartily for the good of all. If this were the only class of private patronage exercised in this country, it would do no great harm, and such evils as did exist under it would be almost lost sight of in the great advantages it conferred. But, unfortunately, there was another class of lay patronage which it was necessary to speak of very differently indeed—that of livings which were continually in the market and which were perpetually being bought and sold over and over again. It was this class of private patronage which gave rise to all the evils that had been indicated, and which they were now trying to get rid of. In his opinion, no Bill that merely dealt with the symptoms and not with the true cause of the evils would be efficacious in removing those evils from which the Church now suffered. As long as the system of selling livings in the market existed, so long would there be not only a great scandal attending the Church and the work of the Church, but there would of necessity be a perpetual recurrence of all those mischiefs to which reference had been made: and he did not think that any legislation would be sufficient effectually and finally to do away with them. Such a Bill as the present would do real good—more good at first than perhaps afterwards. It would do good until the lawyers succeeded in finding out how to evade its provisions and the process would forthwith commence, and in no very long space of time they would find that their legislation must be renewed with precisely the same evils to deal with, although, perhaps, in a somewhat different form. Meanwhile there was going on this great scandal of the public sale of those trusts belonging to the Church. Their Lordships generally could hardly understand how great was the mischief done by the mere scandal, without reference to the actual wrong done. He and his right rev. Brethren, who were constantly meeting with persons in the lower classes and hearing what they felt on such a matter as this, knew how great was the evil. It was constant matter of conversation among such people. They felt it to be a kind of personal degradation that the interests of the parishioners should be made the subject of bargain and sale, and they were taunted with it by those who did not belong to their own communion. The Nonconformist shopman taunted the Churchman in the market with the fact that the parish to which he belonged had been sold over his head, and that he had to accept the parson who had bought the place with his money. Not long since an eminent Member of the late Government brought a heavy indictment against the Established Church in a speech addressed to his constituents, and one prominent feature of that indictment was the scandalous traffic in livings—not the abuses arising from it, but the scandalous traffic itself. So long as that traffic existed, so long would it be a source of weakness and a blot and disgrace to the Church. It should not be forgotten that grave imputations might be more or less mischievous according to the nature of the institutions against which they were cast. In every institution there were particular points, an imputation upon which would touch the very life. If, for instance, it was said of the whole Army that the great body of them were immoral, although it would be a very grave and serious thing to say, yet it would not of necessity affect the efficiency of the Army. It would still for the purpose of defending the country be an efficient instrument. But what Army could stand if there were an imputation against its courage, and that imputation was not resented? What Army could bear to have it said of them that they were an army of cowards? The imputation would demand the most complete refutation. The same thing was true of a Church charged with trafficking in men's souls. It interfered with the strength and efficiency of the Church. It made many feel that they ought not to belong to such an institution. It put a stumbling block in the way of tender consciences. And surely when such an imputation was cast against the Church,

there ought to be some overwhelming reason for persisting in upholding such a system. It ought not merely to be said that certain advantages came out of it—that here and there good men were put into livings. That would happen in any system. So it was possible in former days to defend the sale of indulgences and masses—he did not doubt that they would be defended on the ground that if they did real good—that masses encouraged the kindness of one man to another, of relative to relative, of the rich for the poor. But now that the system was gone, could it be for a moment tolerated on any such ground? He entirely admitted that good men were brought into the Church here and there; but the gross evil and scandal of the sale would be seen when it was considered what a man sold who sold a living. He sold one of the most important trusts which it was possible for a man to hold. Upon him depended whether there should be in the parish a good man, a judicious man, a devoted man, a really religious man; or, on the other hand, an idle man, a careless man, an irreverent man, a man with a bad temper, a man with no heart in his work. What a difference that would make with the young, with the aged, with the sick. How many were there who had reason to thank God for a conscientious and careful patron, who had brought to the parish a really right-minded clergyman! Well, this trust was to be sold—the patron was no longer willing to continue in the discharge of it. And was there care taken that the person to whom it was to be handed over was a fit person to exercise it? No. That was entirely left to the solicitor, whose duty it was to make the best bargain he could. In fact, as soon as the trustee had determined to treat his trust as a merchantable commodity, all his conscientiousness departed, and his one consideration was the amount of money he was to get for it. But that was not all—for livings were sometimes sold by public auction, and everyone knew the effect such a thing had upon the people of the parish that was sold; and yet the sale by public auction was simply the open exercise of a right which was more often exercised less openly. A public sale was the naked assertion of a principle. Sometimes the Law itself was party to such a sale. If, in a marriage settlement, it was provided that in certain contingencies the trustees should sell—or the executors named in a will—the trustees or executors would have no choice but to sell by public auction. He knew it would take a long time to persuade the country and the Legislature to deal effectually with such an evil as this; but it was the duty of all those who looked closely into the matter to press the necessity of sweeping away so great a scandal upon those who had any voice whatever in dealing with it. As long as it existed, not only would it be impossible to get rid of the evils which they all deplored, but it would be a perpetual source of mischief to the whole Church. It was only in proportion as these sales could be checked, that the object they all had in view could be attained. The difficulty was that property of this kind should have been created, because when people had purchased such property it was impossible not to allow them to sell it; and if they were not allowed to sell, compensation must be given to them. A certain portion of every living really belonged to the patron; and if he wished to part with the trust he might take away the part of the living that belonged to him, and leave the rest to provide for the spiritual wants of the parishioners; and this was the only mode of reconciling the rights of the patron with what was due to the Church. He only rose to protest against the idea that any mere palliatives should have the effect of preventing the great and serious evils which had been brought under their notice. No one who had carefully studied the working of the Church could come to any other conclusion than this—that as long as the sale of advowsons and next presentations went on, the Church of England would be unable to present to the people at large the aspect which she ought to wear.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY said, he was glad it had been admitted by the right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of Exeter) that there was no real difference between the sale of advowsons and next presentations, and that if their Lordships wished to meet public feeling in this matter they must go further and abolish the sale of advowsons. But what did that come to but the abolition of the right of private patronage? Parliament could not say to a patron—"This living is your property, but it must never be sold, and must always be retained in your own hands." Would they tell a landowner that his patronage might be divided and sub-divided among his heirs, male or female, but must never be sold by himself or any one of them? The consequences would be absurd and disastrous. It would only be another way of destroying its value as property. It would be better to abolish private patronage altogether. Then, suppose that private patronage were accordingly abolished; what would be put in its place? Public patronage. But whose? Was it to be placed in the hands of the Crown, or in the hands of the Bishops, or left to the election of congregations? In the latter case it would be fraught with evils far more intolerable than those now complained of. Private patronage was now mainly connected with the landed estate of the country; but was it fit to tie it up to that one class, and not admit the moneyed and commercial interests of the country to participate in it? What avenue to the Church, except by purchase, was offered to the sons of wealthy men not connected with land? A leading merchant or banker might have among his sons one who was studious and pious, and who wished to go into orders to do good to his fellow-creatures—what chance would he have of obtaining a Church living if the sale of advowsons were prohibited? It must be remembered that the merits and qualifications which make up a good clergyman were not to be ascertained in the market-place, or made public, as in the law and other professions. What was now done? The merchant said to his son—"If you wish to go into the Church I will buy you a living;" and there could not be a better subject for a clergyman than the pious son of a man belonging to the mercantile and trading classes;—and yet, if the sale of livings were prohibited, that class would be shut out, and Church patronage would be confined to the landed gentry. Their Lordships must look at this question on all sides, and not be led away by a cry against the sale of spiritual functions. These were conferred by the Bishop at his ordinations without pecuniary considerations, and patronage gave merely the power of exercising these functions in one place rather than another. He was also of opinion that greater facilities ought to be given for exchanges in the Church. They were often very desirable on many accounts, but they were now exceedingly difficult; and he could not see why, under proper regulations, exchanges of livings should not be more easily made. Concurring in the desirability of sending the Bill to a Committee upstairs, where the details could receive closer and more exact attention, he wished to pay his tribute of respect to the manner in which the right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of Peterborough) had brought the matter before the House, and also before the Committee of last year over which the right rev. Prelate presided. His temper, his patience, his consideration for others, and his known ability enabled the right rev. Prelate to discharge the duties of Chairman, in a very difficult matter, with an efficiency that had not often been exceeded in that House.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, he entirely concurred in the principle and general scope of the Bill, but thought there were very great objections to the proposal contained in the 10th and 11th clauses. Even by those who approved its purpose it might be objected to on the ground of its futility; for what was the use of making inquiries as to the character of a clergyman in a place probably a long way off from his previous abode, and where he would probably never have been heard of before? Neither did there appear to be any use or necessity for the third hearing by the Privy Council, which the clause proposed to give, as to the facts of immorality. But he objected altogether to the clause, because it proposed to have that done by three parishioners which it was the duty of the Bishop to do; for it was the duty of a Bishop to be acquainted with the characters of his clergy, and to be able to give an answer as to their character when inquiry was made. There could be few patrons who, however well acquainted with a clergyman, would not, out of courtesy, write to his Bishop before proposing to present him to another Bishop. He also thought the proposed mode of announcing a clergyman from the pulpit and of placarding him on his church doors to his future parishioners as a possible criminal clerk was very objectionable and unnecessary. Criminal clerks were not of such frequent occurrence as to justify such a step; and where they existed they were too well known to make the proposed precaution necessary. This appeal for denunciation, however, might very possibly open the door to and encourage calumny, and that sort of calumny which it would be difficult to refute or punish; for the right rev. Prelate who introduced the Bill was probably aware that traps might be set for young curates by persons sending doubtful characters to them in the guise of penitents. Another objection to the clause was that it was not based on any existing legal foundation, and that it would have a tendency to introduce a desire for that use of election in the Church which the right rev. Prelate was so rightly opposed to; for their Lordships would remember the emphasis with which last Session he had spoken of trial sermons and competitive prayers.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY: My Lords, I cannot help thinking that an important distinction may be drawn between the sale of next presentations and the sale of advowsons. I also desire to call attention to another matter which seems to have escaped observation—the bonds of resignation. Perhaps your Lordships are not aware of the state of the law with respect to these bonds. The whole argument of to-night has rested on the theory that the rights of patronage are a sacred trust. It appears to me that the Act as to bonds of resignation which was passed some time ago tends very greatly to encourage the idea of property rather than of trust in matters of patronage, in as far as these bonds of resignation seem to recognize property alone and not trust. In the event of a patron desiring to take a bond of resignation from a person appointed to a living, he may do so either in favour of one person, who may be any individual whatsoever, or of two persons—in which latter case his right of patronage is limited, in what appears to be an extraordinary way, either to his son, or grandson, or nephew, or uncle; as if it were impossible that any other person fit to hold the living could be found except one within those degrees of consanguinity. Had it not been "except" son, grandson, nephew, or uncle, there might have been something to be said for it; but it seems an extraordinary arrangement to be made that, in the event of a person desiring to influence the patronage after his death, or at some distant period, he is to select a nominee who probably is in his cradle, and whose character must be, therefore, totally unknown; and he is to designate him as rector or incumbent of a parish, the circumstances of which during the 23 years that have to pass before this person comes of age to be ordained may have entirely changed—say from the development of mineral wealth—which may render the position of a clergyman there very difficult. It is rather surprising to me that this matter has not been more carefully considered by the Committee. It is obvious that the whole proposed legislation in this matter is based rather upon the idea of trust than upon that of property. I do not, indeed, expect that we shall be able to obtain a perfect system of patronage as long as human nature remains imperfect; but I do think it is our duty to remove from the Statute Book everything which encourages an imperfect view of the duties which devolve upon patrons in the exercise of their rights. Your Lordships must have been gratified, as I was, by the testimony which has been borne to the mode in which private patronage is generally administered in this country. I should be the last person in any way whatever to desire to diminish the influence of private patrons in the distribution of livings in the Church of England; but I think we are bound to impress by our legislation upon the patrons that it is a sacred trust which they exercise, and that we should throw the idea of property in the living as much as possible into the shade. No doubt, there may be difficulties in overcoming evils which have grown up in consequence of the sale of next presentations, and to a certain extent the same evils may prevail in the matter of the sale of advowsons; but, at all events, if I can persuade your Lordships to stop the sale of next presentations the evils will be greatly diminished. Notwithstanding the speech of my noble Friend (the Earl of Harrowby), I do consider these sales an evil. If I had entered the House a few minutes ago, when my noble Friend was speaking, I might have supposed he was speaking of purchase in the Army, and was advocating that which by universal consent had been decided against. If the practice has been proved by legislation to have been a bad one for the Army, it does not appear to me it can be a good one for the Church. I cannot help thinking there is a great deal of force in the argument which has been used by my right rev. Brother (the Bishop of Exeter), as to the mere fact of the sale of these next presentations producing much scandal. I do not believe that, except for the purpose of maintaining an hypothesis, it would be possible to defend these sales of next presentations. No doubt good arises out of many most questionable practices; but what we have to consider is what on the whole will be likely to be most beneficial to the Church. I confess when I read such speeches as that which has, I believe, been alluded to this evening as having recently greatly influenced the country, and which was a brief against the Church of England—I think the strongest part of the brief is the attack on this system of the sale of next presentations—I feel great difficulty in knowing how I can defend the Church of which I am a member against accusations which appear to me to be well-grounded. So far as I can gather, all the witnesses before the Select Committee and the Committee itself are in favour of the abolition of the sale of next presentations. I cannot believe that many of those who are most opposed to the Church of England will object to our ridding ourselves of this blot on our Church system. I have every reason to believe that the most worthy members of other denominations would repudiate altogether the policy which is attributed to those who dissent from the Church of England, of desiring to retain as many of our corruptions as possible in order that the institution they disapprove may fall to pieces from the existence of those faults. I believe that high-minded members of other denominations will agree with ourselves that, while the Church of England retains the great post of instructor to so large a portion of the nation as at present, it is the duty of all, whether they approve of the Church or not, to give their assistance to remove evils which are patent to all. I cannot help thinking that even that eloquent voice which has been raised in denunciation of the Church on account of this evil will not be silent, should this Bill reach "another place," in helping us to rid ourselves of so very great a scandal. I take it for granted that if the Bill is referred to a Select Committee the understanding is that, after bestowing on it the most careful consideration, the Committee will send the Bill back in time for legislation this Session.

THE BISHOP OF PETERBOROUGH acknowledged the degree of favour and acceptance with which the Bill had been received both by the noble Duke, who represented Her Majesty's Government in that House, and by other noble Lords. The recommendations and suggestions that had been made by so many of their Lordships should receive the consideration to which they were justly entitled. On the other hand, none of the objections went to the principle of the measure. He need not dwell upon all the criticisms that had been offered. He would, however, observe that the counter signature of a foreign Bishop to the testimonials of a presentee was not required as an additional testimony to his character and fitness, but merely as an assurance of the credibility and respectability of the witnesses; it would affirm, not the truth of their statements, but their credibility. A case had occurred in which a Bishop wrote—

"I cannot refuse to countersign the credibility of the witnesses, although I think it right to state that during two of the three years referred to the presentee was in gaol."

The question of the necessity of the counter signature of a Bishop was the question raised in the well-known case of "Exeter v. Marshall," and the objection to it was that it would give the Bishop an absolute veto. He met that point by allowing the Bishop to object to the credibility of the witnesses, and by making provision for that and all other objections by the Bishop, to be brought before a Judge. The requirement proceeded on the maxim—Quis custodiet custodes. In assenting to the proposal of the noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond) to refer the Bill to a Select Committee, he would venture earnestly to express a hope that the Select Committee would be held at such a time, and would conduct its deliberations with such speed as would secure that the Bill should be again brought before their Lordships, and be sent "elsewhere," so as to afford a fair chance of becoming law, if it should seem fit to the Legislature, this Session.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR begged to say, with reference to the appointment of the Committee, that he had had a communication from Lord Coleridge, expressing his great anxiety, whatever form the Committee might assume—whether it was a Select Committee or a Committee of the Whole House—it should not sit during his absence on circuit till after Easter. Being at the head of the Court where proceedings by Quare impedit would take place, he was naturally anxious that he should have the opportunity of carefully looking into the frame of the Bill before it passed through Committee.

Motion agreed to: Bill read 2^d accordingly, and referred to a Select Committee.

QUESTION.

LORD STRATHEDEN inquired of Her Majesty's Government, Whether the statements of the public press to the effect that commercial treaties with Servia and Roumania are about to be formed without any reference to the negotiations alleged by Her Majesty's Government to be in progress are well founded? He should consider such a state of things a departure from the Treaty of 1856; and he reserved to himself the right of considering with those Members of the House who turned their minds to foreign policy, what steps should be taken, either with or without Papers, to retard or prevent results which it would be a guarded phrase to characterize as useless and irreparable.

THE EARL OF DERBY: When my noble Friend put a Question to me a few days ago upon this subject, I told him that three great Powers—Austria, Russia, and Germany—had asserted their right to enter into commercial engagements with the Governments of the Principalities irrespective of the sanction of the Porte, and I added that in doing so they had protested strongly against the idea of any intention being imputed to them of violating the treaties into which they had entered. Maintaining, as they do, that the right they so claimed is a right conferred on them by those treaties, I think it quite possible, and under the circumstances probable, that these Governments, or some of them, may proceed to act upon the principle which they have laid down. It is clear that they could only have laid it down with the intention of acting upon it sooner or later; but they have not done so as yet, so far as I am aware. I have every reason to believe that communications have taken place between these Governments and the Government of the Principalities upon the subject; but I have not before me at the present time any information to justify me in saying that commercial treaties will be concluded.

TRANSLATION OF IRISH MANUSCRIPTS.—QUESTION.

MR. SULLIVAN asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to include in the Estimates to be laid this year before Parliament an appropriation for continuing the translation of important Irish manuscripts commenced and partly carried out, in compliance with the Treasury Minute of 1857?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I have been in communication during the Recess with several distinguished Irish scholars upon the subject of the hon. Member's Question, with the view of arriving at a decision as to the best mode in which the work could be carried out. The result was that I addressed a communication to the Royal Irish Academy, informing them that the Irish Government were desirous of resuming the publication of these important manuscripts, commencing with the Annals of Ulster, and asking if they would consent to undertake this work. In reply, the Council of the Academy have expressed their readiness to do so, and have undertaken to furnish with all convenient despatch a detailed estimate of the expense which the publication will involve. That estimate will, of course, be laid before the Treasury.

IRELAND—ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY.—QUESTIONS.

MR. O'REILLY asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, What has caused the delay in granting the discharge or pension of certain men of the Royal Irish Constabulary who, having complied with the conditions of the Act 37 and 38 Vic. c. 80, have applied for their discharge?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in reply, said, the delay had been caused by some doubt as to the proper interpretation of the terms of the Pension Act of last Session. That doubt, he was happy to say, had been solved, and the cases to which the hon. Gentleman referred would be very shortly dealt with.

Afterwards,

MR. STACPOOLE (for Mr. SHEL) asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether Her Majesty's Government will extend the advantages gained by the members of the Royal Irish Constabulary who retire under the Act of last Session to those who had retired before its enactment?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in reply, said, it was not possible to extend to retired members of the Irish Constabulary the provisions of an Act which was passed subsequently to their retirement.

INDIA—OFFICERS OF THE INDIAN ARTILLERY.—QUESTION.

COLONEL JERVIS asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether it is true that the assurance given by the Secretary of State for War on the 20th of July 1874, that Majors of the Royal Artillery serving in India should receive the pay of their substantive rank, has not been fulfilled; whether all officers of the British Army ordered to proceed to India, or who whilst in India, getting promoted, are retained in India on duty, are not entitled to the pay of their substantive rank whilst serving in that country; whether those Officers of the late Indian Artillery who volunteered for general service at the time of the amalgamation, and, in consequence, received Commissions in the Royal Artillery, were not assured by the General Order of the Viceroy and Governor General of India in Council, 10th April 1861, that on so doing they should "draw the pay and allowances fixed by Her Majesty's Regulations for that arm of the service, according to the situation and locality in which they were serving;" and, whether the payments made in India to Officers commanding Horse and Field Batteries under the contract system were so paid previous to the Warrant of 5th July 1872, irrespective of whatever may have been their substantive rank, for duties performed and expenditure incurred, which in the British Service have always been provided for otherwise by the State?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Majors of Artillery, while serving in India and in command of their batteries will, on and after the 1st of April, 1875, receive the Indian pay and allowances of their recently advanced rank. Officers of the British Army serving in India are entitled to receive the British pay of their substantive rank. Their claims to Indian allowances are determined by the rules of the Government of India in force in India at the time. Officers of Indian Artillery who volunteered to the Royal Artillery in 1861 were informed that "they should draw the pay and allowances fixed by Her Majesty's Regulations for that arm of the service according to the situation and locality in which they may be serving." The contract system alluded to was in force previous to the 5th of July, 1872. Under this system payments were made to the officers commanding field batteries, irrespective of their substantive rank, to meet certain expenditure incurred. These allowances are upon so liberal a scale that the officer receiving them derives considerable emolument

QUESTION.

MR. DALRYMPLE asked the Vice President of the Council, If any estimate has yet been made of the money about to be borrowed from the Public Works Loan Commissioners for the erection of Schools in Scotland, under the Education Act 1872; of the annual cost likely to be levied on districts in Scotland for the repayment of the loan and the interest upon it; and of the rate per £1 of taxation which will be rendered necessary for the maintenance of such schools in future?

VISCOUNT SANDON: The Board of Education for Scotland have up to the 20th of February, 1875, sanctioned loans to 295 school boards, amounting to £883,197 19s. Eighteen applications for loans to the amount of £95,552 are under consideration. It is estimated that in all about £2,000,000 will be required for the erection of public schools in Scotland under the Scotch Education Act of 1872. No information has yet been given to us as to the annual charge upon districts for repayment. The Return moved for by the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren) in 1874 will shortly be presented, and will show the rates already levied in Scotland; but no estimate has been or can be formed of future rates for maintenance of schools, which will mainly depend upon the expenditure incurred by the school boards.

ARMY—THE RESERVE AND THE MILITIA.—QUESTION.

COLONEL MURE asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether there is any truth in the current report that men included in the First Class Army Reserve enlist also in the Militia, and are therefore returned twice over as part of the defence of the Country; and, whether there is any effective machinery in existence to prevent such fraudulent enlistment?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Very few cases have been brought to the notice of the War Department of members of the First Class Army Reserve enrolling for the Militia, and where convictions have been obtained the men have been punished by imprisonment and struck off the strength of either Militia or Reserve. The machinery for preventing fraudulent desertion is not adequate, and is under consideration. Prosecutions result on detection of offenders.

ARMY—INFANTRY ACCOUTREMENTS. QUESTION.

COLONEL MURE asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it has recently been found necessary to supply sets of accoutrements for the Infantry of the Line of a size smaller than has previously been used, and at what period this alteration commenced?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: The valise equipment was introduced into the Army in 1868. The braces for this equipment were issued in three sizes. In March, 1874, it was reported by the officer commanding the rifle depôt that the smallest size was too large for men of 5 feet 5 inches. A fourth size was, therefore, added in October, 1874.

CHEAP EDITIONS OF THE STATUTES. QUESTION.

MR. EDWARD STANHOPE asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether, having regard to the statement of the Controller of the Stationery Department that a popular edition of the Statutes might be produced annually and sold for about 7s., and to the Recommendation of the Select Committee on Public Departments (Purchases, &c.) 1874, he intends to take any steps towards making a cheap and compact edition of the Statutes accessible to the general public?

MR. W. H. SMITH: There are at present two editions of the statutes published by Messrs. Eyre and Spottiswoode, the one at the price of a 1d. per sheet of four pages imperial octavo, the other at 2d. per sheet of 12 pages royal octavo. The average price of a volume of the latter bound is 12s.; but the unbound sheets could be obtained for from 9s. to 9s. 6d. It is thought that without any editorial matter or references an edition might be published for about 7s. 6d., but it is not considered that such an edition would pay. It is, however, open to any publisher to bring out a cheap edition, as Messrs. Eyre and Spottiswoode have no

LAND REVENUE ACT—PURCHASE OF LAND.—QUESTION.

COLONEL GILPIN asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If he would inform the House by what authority Her Majesty's Commissioners of Woods and Forests had purchased a portion of the Dynevor Estate in Bedfordshire, and from what fund the purchase money has been paid; and, whether Her Majesty's Commissioners are aware of, and have sanctioned, the proceedings of the land agent in treating with the old tenants?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER: The estate of Stagsden, in Bedfordshire, was purchased under the authority of the Act 10 Geo. IV. c. 50, s. 108, and of a Treasury Warrant, dated September 12, 1873, out of monies derived from the sale of parts of the possessions and land revenues of the Crown, according to the provisions of the Land Revenue Acts. All claims by the tenants in respect of permanent improvements were, by the terms of the contract, to be satisfied by the vendors, and it is believed that their claims have been satisfied. Before offering the estate for re-letting, the Commissioner of Woods in charge of the property had a valuation made by a competent surveyor, as required by the Land Revenue Acts, and he has no power to let any part of it for less than may appear to be a reasonable rent. Two of the tenants have died, and the farm of one of them has been added to another holding. All the farms upon the estate as so re-arranged, with the exception of two, have been re-let to former tenants upon the terms proposed to them, and negotiations are pending with the occupying tenants with regard to those two farms. The Commissioner of Woods in charge of the estate is aware of, and has sanctioned, the proceedings of his land agent, which have met with his entire approval.

NAVY—RETIREMENT IN THE MARINE CORPS.—QUESTION.

MR. ANDERSON asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, If he is aware that in the Marine Corps, under the retirement scheme of the late Government, a practice exists of officers paying their seniors to retire, and that through this practice individual officers gain, but the officers in general are deprived of part of the promotion which that scheme was intended to secure to them; and, whether he has taken or will take steps to prevent this practice?

MR. HUNT: Since the hon. Member's Question has been put on the Paper I have made inquiries, and have been unable to learn of the existence of the practice he refers to.

MR. ANDERSON: I give Notice, Sir, that I shall repeat my Question on the subject in a more pointed form.

TURNPIKE TRUSTS AND TOLLS. —SCOTLAND.—QUESTION.

MR. JAMES BARCLAY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he intends to introduce this Session any measure dealing with turnpike trusts and the abolition of tolls in Scotland?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, the subject had been for some time under the consideration of the Government, and that but for the temporary absence of the Lord Advocate from the House, in consequence of circumstances which they all deeply deplored, he (Mr. Assheton Cross) would probably have been in a position now to state the views of the Government on the question. He was happy to say he should have the assistance of his right hon. and learned Friend again very shortly, and then he would state what were the intentions of the Government in the matter.

ARMY—YEOMANRY PAY AND ALLOWANCES.—QUESTION.

VISCOUNT NEWPORT asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the recommendations of the Inspectors of Yeomanry respecting pay and allowances have been taken into consideration; and if so, whether they will be carried out?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Attention has been given to the recommendations of the Inspectors of Yeomanry; but, inasmuch as they would lead to a large excess upon the Vote, if generally applied, it is considered necessary to institute some preliminary inquiries with reference to the proposed standard of efficiency under which alone an increase could be justified.

Mr. Anderson

POST OFFICE—STRANRAER AND LARNE MAIL SERVICE.—QUESTION.

MR. ANDERSON asked the Postmaster General, If he is in a position to inform the House that in establishing a new paid route for part of the Mails between the south of Scotland, the north of England and Ireland, via Stranraer and Larne, the payment will not exceed the rate of 2s. 6d. per 100 letters, and no letters will be sent to be subject to that payment except such as would be expedited by the change?

LORD JOHN MANNERS, in reply, said, the payment would not exceed the rate of 2s. 6d. per 100 letters, and that none would be sent to be subject to that payment except such as would be expedited by the change.

METROPOLIS VALUATION ACT, 1869. QUESTION.

MR. GOLDSMID asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is necessary that the householders of the Metropolis should be called upon to answer questions so likely to cause difficulty and embarrassment as those which under "The Metropolis Valuation Act, 1869," are now put to them? The hon. Member said, he might add that a number of householders had stated that it was absolutely impossible for them to answer the questions which had been put to them.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, the questions which had been sent round were the same as those which had been sent every five years under the provisions of the Metropolis Valuation Act of 1869; there was nothing in them he thought of an objectionable character, and they contained nothing but what was necessary for the purposes of the Act.

IRELAND—RELEASE OF RIBBONMEN. QUESTION.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If he can give the Return of Memorials, &c. relative to the Peace Preservation (Ireland) Acts and Protection of Life and Property Act (of which Notice has been given); whether any Memorial was presented for the release of certain alleged Ribbonmen; whether such Memorial or

Memorials were signed by any Justices of the Peace for the county; and whether those alleged Ribbonmen have been set at liberty, and are now at large in the county Westmeath; what were the grounds upon which such release was sought; and, whether any Memorial was presented praying for the release of alleged Ribbonmen on the ground that, if kept in pay, they would give secret information, and also protect, in their evictions of tenantry, those landlords who paid them?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in reply, said, the noble Lord had asked for two Returns. One—a Return of the names of the persons arrested in the county of Westmeath under the powers of the Peace Preservation and Protection of Life and Property Acts, showing the time of detention of each prisoner and the names of those in custody—there was no objection to give, except that most of the information that would be comprised in it was already in the possession of the House; but the other for the copy of any memorials, with the signatures, which had been presented for the release of any of the prisoners, he could not consent to furnish, because communications relating to the Act in question had been always looked upon as confidential, and it would be unfair to the persons who made them that they should become public property. Nineteen persons had been arrested as Ribbonmen under the provisions of the Act referred to, but since July last none had been imprisoned. Some of the memorials that had been presented had been signed by Justices of the Peace, but for the reason he had already given he could not state the grounds on which the release of the men was sought. The last part of the noble Lord's Question was a serious imputation upon the landlords of the county which the noble Lord had the honour to represent (Westmeath), and he (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) was convinced that the Question was only put with the object of obtaining a refutation of certain allegations which had been made. He could say that the report on which the noble Lord had based this portion of his Question was entirely without foundation.

IRELAND—DUBLIN MAIN DRAINAGE ACT, 1871.—QUESTIONS.

SIR ARTHUR GUINNESS asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce a Bill this Session to amend the Dublin Main Drainage Act of 1871, for the purpose set forth in Memorial of the Dublin Corporation to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, founded on their resolution of 22nd January, viz.:

"That application be made to the Government for a loan not exceeding £500,000, to carry out the main drainage works, upon the following terms and conditions as to interest and repayment, viz.:—The interest payable to be three per cent. per annum upon the net principal sum remaining due each year; the loan to be repaid (in seventy-three and a-half years) by the annual instalments of £6,000 referred to by His Grace the Lord Lieutenant, which shall be granted year by year to the Corporation by Her Majesty's Treasury, as well as by a proportion of the sum to be allocated by the Government in lieu of the municipal rates upon public buildings in the borough of Dublin, and estimated at £1,000 per annum; the Government accordingly to introduce and effect the necessary amendment of the Dublin Main Drainage Act by a Public Bill in the next Session of Parliament, without cost to the corporation?"

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in reply, said, the Dublin Corporation appeared to be labouring under a remarkable misapprehension of the intentions of the Government and of the reply given by the Lord Lieutenant to a deputation of the citizens of Dublin who waited on him in reference to the drainage scheme. The scheme suggested for the repayment of a Government loan of £500,000 was one which emanated entirely from the Dublin Corporation themselves. The Government had no intention of introducing a Bill to carry it into effect. They had still under consideration certain proposals of the Corporation on the general question; but the only definite undertaking which he had yet been authorized to give was that which he stated to the House last Session—namely, that the Government were prepared to extend the borrowing powers of the Corporation for main drainage purposes from the present limit of £350,000 to £500,000.

MR. HANKEY wished to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, with reference to the Question of the hon. Baronet, Whether there is any practical difference between an advance of Public Money, the capital and interest of which is to be repaid out of Imperial Revenue, and an absolute Grant of Money for like purposes?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I can see none myself; but my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland is very ingenious, and if he proposes a measure on the subject I dare say he may be able to point out some such difference.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACT—CASUALTIES AT SEA — A ROYAL COMMISSION.—QUESTION.

MR. GOURLEY asked the President of the Board of Trade, If his attention has been called to the large number of coal-laden vessels which have recently been burnt at sea, and also if his attention has been called to the frequent cases of dismasting of large iron sailing ships; if so, if he will state to the House what course he intends to adopt for the purpose of ascertaining the cause, with the view of diminishing the frequency of such casualties?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: The Government have lately resolved to advise the issue of a Royal Commission to inquire into the causes and remedies of the spontaneous combustion of coal ships, which has so much increased. There have been several cases of new large iron sailing ships being dismasted, and the subject is engaging the careful attention of shipowners, naval architects, and the register societies, the parties most interested and acquainted with the subject. I hope they will be able to devise some plan by which the evil may be remedied.

MERCHANT SHIPS (MEASUREMENT OF TONNAGE) BILL—LEGISLATION. QUESTION.

MR. PALMER asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether any legislation is proposed by Her Majesty's Government, this Session, with reference to the Bill on Merchant Ships (Measurement of Tonnage), in accordance with the Report from the Select Committee of last year?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY, in reply, said, no measure of the kind mentioned in the Question of the hon. Member was at present contemplated by Her Majesty's Government.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACT AMENDMENT BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. BENTINCK asked, What the Government were going to do with regard to the Merchant Shipping Bill which stood last on the Paper?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY, in reply, said, he would on that day week ask the House to read the Bill the second time. If in the interim any further postponement was deemed necessary, he would give the House timely Notice.

FRIENDLY SOCIETIES BILL.—[BILL 2.]

(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Secretary Cross, Mr. William Henry Smith.)

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

DR. CAMERON, in rising to move that the Bill be read a second time upon this day six months, said: I rise to move the rejection of the Bill, because I believe that if passed it will but add another to that long list of ill-advised and fruitless enactments respecting Friendly Societies which have conspired to leave these societies in that very unsatisfactory condition in which the recent Royal Commission found them. I have carefully studied the voluminous Reports of that Commission, and come to the discussion of this question with the highest respect for the patience and industry displayed by its Members, and especially by those two of its Members who now sit on the Government bench. But I maintain, in the first place, that in the Bill now before the House the fundamental and primary recommendation of the Commissioners has been omitted, and I appeal in support of my position if not from Philip drunk to Philip sober, at least from the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the right hon. Gentleman the Chairman of the Friendly Societies Commission. If hon. Members will refer to the broad outline of the system recommended by the Commissioners, contained in Paragraph 880 and the succeeding paragraphs of their Report, they will find that the very first feature of their scheme is that—

"local registers should be established in which the names, places of business, and certain other particulars of societies carrying on their operations within the locality, shall be recorded in a form prescribed by the Government."

If they turn to the unanimous recommendation of the Commissioners in Page 213 of their Report, they will find the first three paragraphs devoted to recommending that in order to provide for the enforcement of the requirements of the law in the case of registered societies—

"a system of local registration under the control of a central office be adopted, the country being divided into a certain number of registration districts, with a deputy-registrar in each."

This is, in fact, the foundation upon which the entire succeeding recommendations of the Commissioners are based. And why? I refer you to Paragraphs 871-2 of the Report for the answer. Because the present system of registration must be considered an utter failure so far as its efficient enforcement is concerned.

"And who," the Commissioners ask, "that reflects for a moment on what is expected from the present central machinery could be surprised at such a failure? How is one man in London to keep nearly 22,000 bodies of men in all parts of England, in the most remote villages, in the most crowded cities, bodies composed to an enormous extent of the ignorant and prejudiced, to a large extent of the obstinate and self-willed, to some extent, it is to be feared, of the self-seeking and dishonest, up to any conceivable standard, however low it may be fixed? Surely," they exclaim, "in the presence of the enormous development of the Friendly Societies movement, a purely central machinery must break down."

And yet, Sir, it is to this purely central machinery that the right hon. Gentleman has reverted. His original Bill was based upon this recommendation of the Commission, and being based upon it, machinery was provided which the Commissioners assumed as indispensable to carry out their recommendations. The right hon. Gentleman in introducing the Bill last Session himself told us it was "obvious" that they must abandon the system to which he now proposed to go back; and he twice placed the institution of a system of local registration foremost among the principles of the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman said, to use his own words in Hansard—

"The main principles of the Bill were to strengthen and improve the machinery of registration; to publish correct tables for the use of those societies; and to encourage and, as far as possible, enforce a system of periodical valuation."—[3 Hansard, ccxix. 1215.]
